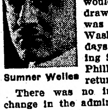
Immediately after the return of the governors, mayors and relief men to their states the movement to remove 4,000,000 persons from the relief rolls and put them to work on public projects by December 15 was started. Four hundred million dollars was available, and it was to be spent directly, without contract requirements. The intention was that the wages should provide for work relief until all the red tape and formalities can be disposed of to inaugurate federal public works, such as public buildings, flood control, reclamation and slum clearance. Ten per cent of the workers to be selected were women, who it was announced would be at nursing and sewing and in clerical positions in offices where employees have been laid off because of dwindling tax yields. The men were to be put to work on parkways, sewers, building repairs, street paving and other work that has been neglected in the cities and states. Their pay ranges from 40 cents to $1.10 an hour.

WISCONSIN'S farm strike fizzled out, so it was called off by the heads of the Farm Holiday association and the milk pool. The pickets were all withdrawn and shipments of milk and other farm produce to the markets were resumed. The milk pool leader said another "holiday" probably would be ordered in February.

AMBASSADOR SUMNER WELLES met President Roosevelt at Warm Springs and conferred with him on the Cuban situation. But, to the surprise of President Grau and others of the ambassador's opponents in Havana, Mr. Roosevelt stated definitely that Mr. Welles would not be withdrawn. Instead he was directed to go to Washington for a few days to talk with Acting Secretary of State Phillips and then to return to Havana.



Sumner Welles

There was no indication of any change in the administration's Cuban policy. It was reported that while Ambassador Welles brought word of no imminent crisis in the island, he told the President that no one could predict when and how serious the next outbreak would be.

Mr. Welles has been anxious to return to the headship of the State department's Latin American division, but he has no desire to leave Cuba under fire, and the President evidently is in full sympathy with him in this.

DETERMINATION of the Hitler regime to control the Protestant church of Germany has led the Roman Catholic church to take the unprecedented step of declaring virtually its solidarity with the non-Nazi pastors who are contending with the radicals of the Nazi Christian church. The Catholic news organ in Berlin, Germania, carried a long editorial supporting the non-Nazi Protestants and exhorting Catholics to solemn reflection.

"Belief in Christ—the thing that Protestantism and Catholicism have in common—is at stake," the paper said. "If this is destroyed we Catholics, too, will strike."

The Germania's editorial reflected the opinion prevalent in religious circles that German Protestantism, and even Christianity, faces the gravest crisis in its history on account of the onslaughts of the radical Nazi Christian movement.

CHINA seems to be headed for another civil war of major proportions. The famous Nineteenth route army, which defended Shanghai against the Japanese early last year, has revolted against the Nanking government and issued a declaration of independence of Fukien province. It is rumored the army has reached an understanding with the communists in Kiangsi province.

The fact that Fukien's chief political principle is continued opposition to Japan has caused apprehension that it is likely to provoke Japanese intervention.

A Few Little Smiles

RESOURCEFUL

The bachelor was paying his recently married friend a visit.

"Well," said the latter, after they had inspected the flat, "what do you think of it?"

"Pretty good," praised the bachelor; "but there's one thing that has struck me as rather strange. Why did you choose a flat with such a tiny kitchen?"

The married man winked artfully. "You're the first man I've told this to, so keep it quiet," he whispered. "It's so small that I can't get in there to help my wife when she's doing the washing-up."

Eighteen and—

She wanted to be a private secretary. She was neither young nor pretty. She answered an ad.

"Oh," she replied with a blush, "I have seen 18 happy summers."

EXPLANATION

For several minutes the young man did not speak. His heart was too full. It was enough for him to know that this glorious creature loved him; that she had promised to be his wife.

With a new and delightful sense of ownership he feasted his eyes upon her beauty, and realized that henceforth it would be his privilege to provide for her welfare and happiness.

His good fortune seemed incredible. Finally he whispered, tenderly: "How did it happen, darling, that such a bright, shining angel as yourself fell in love with a dull, stupid fellow like me?"

"Goodness knows," the girl murmured, absently. "I must have a screw loose somewhere."

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, is barred from becoming an acknowledged suitor because of conditions of her father's will that her husband must match her small fortune with his own. To do this, Jordan has a wild hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette. Jessica tells Jordan and Doctor White, her guardian, of an encounter she has with an ill-mannered sailor. Two Frenchmen, the comte De Corlay and his son Robert, claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property.

Robert nodded coolly. "The same dog-eared blighter, papa."

Tom in his interest forgot his own suspicions and animosity. "Some skunk that got hep to your plans and is trying to beat you to it?"

"Right-o," Robert said. "This Sebastien was quartermaster aboard the destroyer I commanded during the war, and a Miquelon man. He must have overheard my father when he came aboard at Brest to tell me about this old Fourquet. She was commanded by our ancestor, and papa found his diary in an escritoire he hauled out of the attic to sell. Some of us were jolly hard hit by the war, y'know. Well, it seems this ancestor of ours had quite a tidy bit of his own private loot on the Fourquet that he hadn't time to salve before she went down. You scarcely could have heard of that?" Robert's light hazel eyes rested a little challengingly on Tom; but their gaze was met steadily enough.

"No," Tom said slowly, "I thought there might be ship's money or plate or some plunder taken off pirates she was chasing before they ordered her to these waters. Bnt what I'm after is her guns."

Robert, catching his father's eye, said lightly, "There, you see, papa? Didn't I say that her guns would pay the shot, even if we failed to collar our revered ancestor's booty?" He looked at Tom. "Would you question our right to the latter, Mr. Jordan?"

"Not if you found it first," Tom assured him, "or the guns either, for that matter. In that case I'd haul out."

"And if you found her first?"

"Well, Lieutenant, I'd have to think that over. I'd say I'd have a heavy salvage claim on whatever was recovered."

"But she is a French ship, Mr. Jordan," the count protested. "More than that, she was a government ship."

Tom shook his head. "She belonged to the French crown. You've since abolished that."

"But we inherit its properties, Mr. Jordan." This from Robert.

"Well, then," said Tom, "in that case you inherit its liabilities with them. The Fourquet, as you know, was ordered here to grab the colony of Pemaquid, over yonder across the bay. Looked at from that slant she is an enemy ship, and you will have to admit you haven't the shadow of a claim on any part of her."

The baffling logic of this point was received by a chuckle from Doctor White. The count muttered "Sapristi!—" and tugged at his imperial with a bewildered look.

Then Robert burst into a rollicking laugh. "My sainted ancestor! Are you an international lawyer, Mr. Jordan? Because if you are, we're torped."

"No, I'm only a reporter."

"Great Scott, that's worse." He turned his smiling face to the count. "Looks as if we were jolly well sunk, papa."

Tom relaxed enough to smile, himself. "Cutting out all this bunk, I can't honestly see just where you gentlemen have a look-in. Here we have an ancient wreck on bottom inside the three-mile limit, which is to say, on American soil. As non-citizens of the United States you haven't even the right to fish commercially in these waters."

"But treasure is much different," objected the count. "A foreigner may hunt for treasure, just as he may look for gold or precious stones."

"Well, I guess that's right, sir," Tom admited, "but in either case findings is keepings, with a rakeoff to the government in the case of treasure. That puts us all on the same mark. Suppose we leave it that way."

Doctor White interrupted at this juncture to invite the foreign treasure seekers to his home. The tide was rising, so they left the motor dory at the little beach, where she would ride as well as at the float. It was four o'clock in the afternoon of a perfect day late in July, a few puffy clouds sailing across the sky. Walking through the woods to the house, Doctor White and the count de Corlay went on ahead, Tom and Robert, who had lingered to carry the boat's killick above high water mark, following.

Tom said as they started, "Do you know, this thing's beginning to get my goat, Lieutenant. I guess the next I'll learn is that we've hit on the same gear to locate the wreck."

"Shouldn't wonder. Great minds, you know. Mine's a galvanometer device—"

Tom threw up his hands. "Holy mackerel!" He staggered back against a tree. Robert's dancing eyes played on him with a puzzled expression. "What's struck you?"

"The whole darned shooting match," Tom gave a silent laugh, a pioneer trait inherited from the days when it was poor scouting to indulge audible mirth in the woods. In a few brief words he explained the principles of his own wreck finder.

Robert drew out a gold cigarette case with family arms engraved upon it, offered it to Tom, then, when both had lighted up, said cheerfully, "It's rum, like all this about thought transference. All the same, there must be something in it."

"That's right," Tom agreed.

They started to walk on again, in silence for a little way. Robert paused presently. "This Sebastien is a bad egg. Worse than that, he's an efficient man, trained diver and a crack on deep ground currents and all that sort of thing. He was detailed to one of our mine sweepers based on St. Nazaire, and served aboard her until you Yankees took over the bulk of the job. Then they gave him to me. I sent him down once to look over our propeller after I had wiped it on a rock off Quiberon."

"How did he get wise to this thing?" Tom asked.

"My darn' fault. I was in my cabin with my father. There's a speaking tube to the wheel, where Sebastien was on duty. Papa's voice is very clear and distinct, so all Sebastien had to do was to clap a lug to his end of it. It wouldn't have mattered if it had been one of our Bretons, but these infernal provincials are devilish keen. That's how the scoundrel did us."

"I heard there was a 'Scotiaman over at New Harbor," Tom said. "That'll probably be his crowd, and with the necessary diving gear aboard."

"Right-o. No doubt his plan is to study the currents a bit, then go down in the most promising places and trudge 'round bottom." Robert's dark fringed eyelids narrowed a little. "Now if we could manage somehow to discourage the rotter—"

"If Not, Then Throw Dice for It."

Tom's jaw hardened and his eyes looked into Robert's. "Let's go over and see about it tonight. Are you game, Lieutenant?"

"Rather," said Lieutenant Viscomte Robert Jean-Marie Raoul de Corlay. "As your Alabama colonials all say, 'Hot dawg!'"

CHAPTER III

Jessica, disturbing to any normal male eye in her snug white jersey, was enchanted to meet her guardian's distinguished visitors. "Why don't you work in partnership, and then if what you find is enough for both, divide?" she asked, on learning the situation. "If not, then you might throw dice for it."

"The 50-50 thing suits me all right," said Tom, "but the count might not care for it."

So the proposition was referred to the count de Corlay, who shook his head. "For one thing I am oppose' to dicing, and more than that, I am not yet prepare' to admit anyone has an equal claim to the personal property of my ancestor."

"Well then, sir," said Tom, "why not put it this way, that if we locate the Fourquet you are to have all that and I'm to have the guns, which is all I counted on to begin with."

"It would be better, I think," said the Count, shifting to French and addressing Bob, "if we were each to pursue his search in all fairness and friendly fashion. Treasure hunting is at the best a ticklish business, and the less there are of complications the better."

To Doctor White the whole situation was fascinating but bizarre by reason of its actuality. He had known always the story of the corvette, but never given it any serious thought. And his guests baffled his habitually clear vision of individual people. He could not be sure about them.

Jessica was entirely at her ease with the visitors. She merged with a curious episode as inconspicuously as a partridge merges with autumn leaves. Such actually appeared to be her proper medium, just as the high shade of elms and shadow lawns enclosed by picket fences were those of her Aunt Martha.

Old Orchards Can Be Made Produce

Fall Fertilization Needed; Followed by Plowing and Pruning.

By W. M. Case, Extension Horticulturist, Colorado Agricultural College.
WNU Service.

There are many old and neglected orchards that could be brought into profitable production with little cost and labor.

When an orchard has been neglected for a number of years, the trees become overgrown with wood, due to lack of pruning. Cultivation has also been neglected and the spaces between the trees are covered with pasture grasses and weeds; the soil is hard and fertility is lacking.

The first thing to be done is to plow the orchard in the fall as deeply as possible. Tree roots in neglected orchards are unusually close to the surface, and hence care should be taken in plowing the first time not to tear up too many roots. The depth can be increased with each successive plowing, as the roots will go down when given a chance. Before plowing, the land should be given a good coat of barnyard manure.

Next in importance is the pruning. This should be done between February 15 and April 15. When trees have been neglected for some years, they are usually full of wood and need thinning. It is not advisable to do all the pruning in one year, as it tends to encourage the growth of suckers or water-sprouts. It is better to take two years in which to bring the trees into shape.

Flax Seed Crop Short; Also Light in Weight

The extremely short flax crop of this year, estimated at less than 8,000,000 bushels, makes it important for farmers and seedsmen to obtain flax seed for sowing next spring, says the United States Department of Agriculture. About 2,000,000 bushels of flax seed will be required for sowing if the usual acreage of nearly 3,000,000 acres is sown, and it is evident, therefore, that many growers will find it good business to hold a part of the present crop for seed.

There was a shortage of flax seed in some localities last spring following the short crop of 1932, but the situation now appears to be even more critical. The production in 1932 was nearly 12,000,000 bushels and the farm price during the fall was less than $1 a bushel, which caused many farmers to hold flax for higher prices.

The department specialists are of the opinion that farmers who plan to sow flax next year should obtain their seed supply while good seed can be obtained near at hand and at approximately market prices. As flax seed is likely to be light in weight, due to the drought and heat throughout the flax-producing area, a supply of seed greater than required should be provided so that in recleaning the light seed can be removed. The shrunken seed should be ground and mixed with other grain for feed, or sold on the market for crushing, the department says.

Bot Control

Farmers who expect to treat their horses for bots this fall will get better results if they wait until one month after the first freezing weather lasting for a day or longer, says the United States Department of Agriculture. This recommendation is based on recent experimental work of the bureau of animal industry, showing that the larvae of the common bot spend from 21 to 28 days in the tongue of the horse before migrating to the stomach. Previous recommendations for treatment of bots have been based on the belief that as soon as the eggs—laid on the hair of a horse—hatched the larvae went directly to the stomach. With the new knowledge of the life cycle of this parasite, control measures may be more effectively used. As soon as freezing weather appears, the eggs may be destroyed by washing the animal with a 2 per cent solution of cresol. Then, after about 30 days, have a competent veterinarian supervise treatment of the animal with carbon disulphide to rid it of the parasites in its stomach.

Wilt in Alfalfa

Wilt is about the most serious disease of alfalfa. Diseased plants become dwarfed, especially when the plants are more than one-half mature size after the field has been cut. Other indications are yellowing of the leaves or mottling and wilting, as if injured by frost. The disease is spread by hay from infected fields, by flow water passing from a diseased field, and perhaps to some extent by mowers. Rotating crops and destroying all plants from a diseased field are control methods. Seed is not known to spread the disease.—Wallace's Farmer.

Where Crops Fit In

There are some crops which are not well suited to very fertile soils. Buckwheat, for example, often produces too much straw and too little grain on rich soils, especially those soils which are very high in nitrogen. Oats are likely to lodge badly on soils too rich in nitrogen. On the other hand, a fertile soil is essential for profitable yields of wheat and barley. Rye will grow well on rich soils but it is also a particularly good crop for light infertile soils.

FARM POULTRY

ALL-NIGHT LIGHTS MAY HARM PULLETS

Early Morning Is Best Time for Illumination.

Chickens of all ages and conditions do not respond equally well to artificial illumination, and a lot of discretion is required in attempting to stimulate egg production by night or early morning lights in the poultry house.

Pullets do better under early morning lights. All-night lights are overstimulating and may result in injury to the pullets. Old hens withstand all-night lighting successfully, according to C. M. Ferguson, extension specialist in poultry husbandry for the Ohio State university.

With hens it is more a matter of determining when egg production is most wanted. In producing eggs for the market, use lights and delay the period of molt, advises Ferguson. But if eggs are wanted for supplying a hatchery this winter or next spring, it is all wrong to light the poultry house now.

Although lights do not affect the hatchability of the eggs, lights too early result in reducing the supply of eggs in early spring when demand by hatcheries is at its peak.

Most marked results from lighting may be obtained when used immediately after the molting period.

If all-night lights are used on the flock too much intensity should be avoided, according to the poultry specialist. A ten-watt lamp or ordinary barn lantern or gas jet with mantle provides suficient light. Light should be directed at the feed and water receptacles, he says.

For early morning lights on hens or pullets a 40 or 50 watt lamp with a reflector attached and placed six feet above the floor seems to give best results. It should be illuminated about 4 a. m.

Not All Pullets Worth Space in Laying House

It does not always pay to put every pullet that is raised into the laying house, warns a poultry expert. There are usually a few in every flock that will scarcely pay their board by the end of the year.

Only such pullets as are in good physical condition, as evidenced by a good condition of flesh, bright eye bright red color in comb and wattles, and well-pigmented skin and shanks in yellow colored breeds, such as the Leghorns and American breeds—Plymouth Rocks, Rhode Island Reds, and Wyandottes—should be given a chance in the laying pen. Thin, poorly grown, poorly feathered and undersized birds are not worth bothering with. They should be sent to market if they have any value as food. If not, they should be killed and burned.

All pullets which do not show quite as much development as the others of the flock can be put in a pen by themselves so that they may have a better chance at the feed hoppers. These undeveloped birds that need a little more time to grow are probably underdeveloped because the more vigorous ones have crowded them away from the feed. A proper selection of the pullets right now will undoubtedly increase the efficiency of the flock during the winter laying season.

Poultry Gleanings

Sunflower seed is grown on a commercial scale near Clarendon, Texas, for chicken feed.

• • •

Cockerels that are to be kept or sold as breeders should be leg-banded. Young stock not good enough to winter should be marketed.

• • •

The Cayuga duck derives its name from Cayuga county, New York, where it was developed about 1850. It resembles the Pekin duck in shape, but is one pound lighter.

• • •

Carbohydrates and hydrocarbons are essential in a balanced poultry ration. They are fuel foods. The carbohydrates furnish the starches and sugars and the hydrocarbons supply the fats, either vegetable or animal.

• • •

New Hampshire reds, a relatively new breed of chickens, resemble the standard Rhode Island reds.

• • •

The use of a good grade of cod-liver oil has proved most beneficial for poultry. Unless the best grades are used, however, its beneficial effects are missing.

• • •

Rye is not liked by fowls. If used at all, it should be fed in very limited amounts. Barley, kafir corn and buckwheat are grains that may be used in the ration.

• • •

Damp litter in the hen house is likely to result from over-crowding.

• • •

A perfectly good, fresh egg shows full and clear before the light; there is almost no air cell at the large end and the yolk outline is only faintly discernible.

• • •

It has been stated that it is easier to throw birds out of production by a lack of water than by a lack of feed. Be sure that not only the old birds but also the young growing birds have plenty of clean, pure water.

"—SAVE IN HIS OWN COUNTRY"

⁂

By Richard Hill Wilkinson

©, Bell Syndicate—WNU Service.

WHEN Bennie Markham was thirteen or fourteen years old he used to sit around the stove in the general store at Maplewood and listen to the older men swap yarns. Up until the time he reached his fifteenth birthday, Bennie's whole universe was centered in Maplewood, and the folks in it were, as far as he knew, exactly like folks everywhere.

There was, for example, Lafe Ripley, who owned and operated the local garage.

It didn't seem to Bennie there could possibly be anyone anywhere who could know more than Lafe.

You could ask Lafe any kind of question about anything, and he had an answer; an answer that was logical and satisfying, too.

He had a deep resonant voice, and possessed a natural bent for story telling, which fact added a convincing note to his tales.

And then there was Bert Morgan, the barber, who made you feel that a man who didn't shave once a day or who let his hair grow over his ears, was a criminal.

When Bert got through talking you most always felt that the most noble ambition a man could possess was to become a good barber.

There was also Joel Ruggles, owner of the general store, who, by his very silence became in the eyes of Bennie a wise and awe inspiring figure.

And there was Marty Dolan, a Spanish war veteran, who had an edge on the others because he'd fought at San Juan hill and could command attention by referring to that memorable battle in a most impressive manner, which he did at frequent intervals.

These men talked and young Bennie listened.

Frequently they directed their conversation to him, in a sort of patronizing manner, for Bennie was an appreciative listener and displayed no little amount of flattery at thus being addressed.

These men to him were gods to be imitated, if possible; to be admired and respected and honored.

In fact Bennie came to believe that if ever he could acquire a fraction of the knowledge with which each was invested, or achieve a small part of the success which each had achieved in his respective line, he would ask no more of life.

Bennie believed these things for a period of two years. And during that time he guiltily nursed a secret ambition.

In spite of the deep impression made upon him by the sages of Ruggles' general store, Bennie wanted to become an artist. A painter.

He felt rather guilty about it; would never for the world have admitted the nature of his secret desire to Lafe or Bert or any of the others.

He know they'd laugh and scoff at him, and that would hurt.

Unfortunately for Bennie's general store career, however, the craving to become an artist persisted.

It was in him rather larger than a woodchuck.

And the youngster's father, Robert Markham, president of the local bank, a kindly, gentle-natured, taciturn man, and hence somewhat mediocre compared with Lafe and Bert, chanced upon a couple of Bennie's free-hand drawings one day and that evening had a heart-to-heart talk with his son.

The upshot of the conference was that Bennie was to go away to school; an art school, there to develop the natural talent which his dad believed he possessed, and seemed to be quite proud of.

Bennie agreed to go, in fact was quite eager about the idea, but he asked his father not to tell anyone what he was up to, especially not to mention it when he was getting a shave or having his car fixed.

And so Bennie, still feeling rather guilty and ashamed when he thought of Lafe and Bert and Joel, went away to school and began to study art.

It wasn't long before Maplewood and the general store wisemen became remote and hazy in his memory.

The natural talent which had begun to assert itself years before was being cultivated, and the results were rather pleasantly surprising, even to Bennie.

Bennie remained at art school for five years, returning during that time to Maplewood at long intervals, and then only for short visits.

He developed fast, displaying an uncanny gift for the creation of original ideas and setting them down on paper in the form of drawings.

The natural talent was polished and groomed to a degree nearing perfection.

Two years after his graduation, Bennie was doing nicely as a free-lance artist drawing illustrations for magazines.

Within a year's time he was being sought by editors all over the country.

He became famous over night.

His signature, scrawled on the bottom of an illustration, instantly identified it as a work of fine artistry.

He stood out head and shoulders above others of the same following.

His name became a by-word in all the leading publishing houses, advertising agencies, art galleries, motion picture companies, newspaper syndicates.

He was known from coast to coast.

At twenty-five Bennie was nearing the peak of his career.

He had achieved fame and wealth greater than he had ever dreamed.

Yet it was all deserving.

He had worked hard, fought and overcome countless obstacles, faced and triumphed over adversaries.

It was during the summer of that same year, following a winter which included, aside from eight hours of daily work, a constant round of illustrated lectures, dinners, parties of every description, week-ends, as the guest of the foremost families of New York and other large cities, that Bennie decided to take a month off and return to Maplewood for a much-needed rest.

He drove up from New York alone in his roadster.

And it was while he was rushing along through the hills of Connecticut, with his mind free for once of business and social engagements, that he thought of those days back in Ruggles' general store with Lafe and Bert and Joel.

He laughed aloud at the thought.

And suddenly, for no reason other than until now he had not found the time to contemplate the matter, he realized what a gullible and wholly trusting little shaver he'd been.

He recalled how he used to sit there, mouth ajar, eyes popping, while one of the three told a yarn that instantly distinguished the orator as a great and wise man.

How ridiculous it now seemed, how unimportant and insignificant these men were in the great scheme of things.

Bennie wondered what they must think of him, now that he was famous.

There was probably some other youngster who, not unlike himself, sat in wonder and awe while the general store sages told great yarns of the days when the now famous Bennie Markham sat in their midst and drew pictures for them on the backs of order blanks.

The picture thus conjured was amusing, and it occurred to Bennie that it might be still more amusing to visit these old cronies during his visit in Maplewood, give them a treat, so to speak.

The thought became father to the act. Two days after his arrival at home, Bennie wheeled his roadster up to Lafe Ripley's garage and ordered gas.

Lafe himself operated the crank, and when the tank was filled Bennie tendered a $10 bill and grinned.

"Hello, Lafe," he said.

Lafe looked up and nodded indifferently.

"Lo, Bennie," he said, digging into his overalls' pocket.

"How's tricks?"

Bennie was a good deal disappointed. Lafe had expressed neither surprise nor pleasure.

He acted quite as if the youth was an every-day customer.

Bennie drove slowly away. Somewhat cooled in arder, but nevertheless anxious to carry out his scheme, he strolled into Bert Morgan's barber shop, and found Bert there alone.

Bert was more agreeable. He shook hands and admitted being glad to see the boy back. And after the lather was well spread he even asked: "What you doin', Bennie? Ain't seen you around much."

Bennie did his best to be casual. "Why, I'm drawing pictures, Bert. You've probably seen some in the magazines."

Bert compressed his lips. "Humm. Yes. But I meant, what are you earning a living at? Ain't yuh workin'?"

Bennie was glad to get out of the place. He didn't call on Joel Ruggles. He went home instead, and there was a hurt look in his eyes. Robert Markham saw the look and smiled. He asked Bennie where he'd been, and when the boy told him, the older man placed an arm about his shoulder and said: "Son, you're famous and a great success in the world outside of your home town. But here in Maplewood you're still little Bennie Markham, who used to sit with eyes a-popping while the village wisemen vied to impress you with their importance. It isn't natural for those men to admit now that you're any greater or wiser than they. Their pride is their forte."

And Bennie, looking into his father's face, know that the wisest man in Maplewood at the present moment was Robert Markham.

Hail Discovery Made by German Scientists

By allowing the heart of a helium atom to "tune in" on the heart of an aluminum atom, creating in it a sympathetic vibration, physicists of the Carnegie institution's department of terrestrial magnetism have smashed the aluminum heart or nucleus.

Experiments on the resonance smashing or disintegration of atoms were performed by Dr. M. Pose in Germany and the Carnegie scientists have confirmed this work and carried it further. It is found that when the attacking alpha particle or wave, which is the helium heart, has the proper energy it penetrates the other atom's nucleus. In this case the alpha particles of mass 4 from radium joined with aluminum of mass 27 and formed silicon of mass 30 and released hydrogen of mass 1 in the form of proton or wave particle of positive electricity.—Science Service.

Two men were out shooting on the moors when a small animal darted across the path and disappeared in the undergrowth. "That looked like a stoat," remarked the first man.

"I should say it was a weasel," said the other.

"Quite so," replied the second, "but a weasel is stoatally different."—London Tatler.

The Graceful Contours of This Boston Windsor Rocker Are Left Revealed When Semi-Upholstered.

SLIP-COVER upholstery is the last word in furniture covers. It is a vogue which plays into the hands of the home decorators, for she can, with her own hands, make these covers, and at small cost. It is a revival of the old-time custom of pioneer days. Then women used to make chair seats and chair backs to put over their favorite windsor rockers. Necessity was the ruling motive, since the winds which howled about the house would seep through the none-too-closely-made foundations and sides of dwellings, and bring cold air into the rooms. Chairs, comfortable enough in summer, were dressed in semi-upholstery for winter, and thus given the needed warmth to add a touch of luxury. Today, while comfort is accented in the modern semi-upholstery, it is decoration which is featured equally.

Slip-cover upholstery can be made by any woman who wishes to cover her chairs or sofas for the welcome warmth the wadded covers provide, or because the covers will protect handsome materials, or hide worn and frayed upholstery. Patterned or plain slip-cover textiles, or glazed chintz, etc., are used and not regular upholstery goods.

Slip-cover patterns can be used, or patterns cut from paper fitted over the chairs themselves. The outer covering pieces should be wadded and lined. Then they are tufted, quilted, or buttoned together at regular intervals over the surface. This can be done when the covers are in sections rather better than after the sections have been seamed together.

How to Make Covers

An easy way to make a semi-upholstered cover for a windsor chair, or one of like character, is to copy the method of our forebears. Cut two pieces of the textile the width and length of the back. Put wadding between them, seam along all edges, tuft with strands of coarse yarn and attach strips of tape at corners. The tapes at top go over the wooden cross piece at top of back, and tie at back of chair or at top edge. The tapes at the other end are tied about the rungs. The back "upholstery" is held securely in place thus. There may or may not be a chair seat, but comfort suggests the making of one. The first thing is to make a cushion to fit the shape and size of the seat of the chair. Then put a cover of the same material as the back upholstery over it. Omit tufting. With back well wadded and cushion well filled with feathers or some substitute, the chair acquires a note of pleasing decoration.

Harvest Moon

The harvest moon is so called because farmers in northern latitudes are able to work in harvest fields until late at night. It shines more brightly in northern Europe and Canada than in the United States. While the harvest moon occurs in the northern hemisphere at mid-September, it occurs in March in the southern hemisphere.

Here is a working model of the latest type of railplane to be perfected in England. Not Coercion but Co-Operation

Whither Bound? A question which, though not frequently uttered, is secretly asked by every student of the national recovery act. Will the gigantic movement already set in motion lead to the return of prosperity? Or, will it result in inflation and national economic bankruptcy? The question "Whither Bound?" assumes the answer can only come from the government itself. Popular opinion seems to hold the government responsible whichever way the wind blows. An attitude of this sort clearly indicates the superficial type of much of the present-day thinking.

It is so easy to pass on to some other person or to some organization the responsibility which rightly belongs to us. Let it be frankly admitted that the responsibility for the return of prosperity does not rest primarily with the government. No amount of legislation can bring about an economic recovery any more than it can create a permanent peace. All the government can do is to set in motion certain forces intended to create a recovered prosperity. A physician prescribes to the best of his ability the medicine intended to restore the patient's health, but he cannot compel his patient to take the medicine. The fundamental spirit of democracy forbids the slightest act of coercion on the part of the government.

No person by coercion can ever be made moral. The moral imperatives do not by force enter the sanctuary of the human will. True the choice of a wrong motive may result in a serious penalty, but the fact remains, we are left free to choose for ourselves between the moral alternatives in life.

It is not coercion but co-operation that will speed the return of prosperity. The responsibility for the success of the national recovery act rests upon every citizen in every state, city and hamlet in this country. There is no possible substitute for the spirit of mutual co-operation. If every citizen does his part the return of prosperity is reasonably assured. If that responsibility is shifted to some other seat of authority other than the individual conscience, the present efforts of the government are fraught with serious danger and in the minds of many expert economists are doomed to chaos and national disaster. Not coercion but co-operation is the soul of the national recovery act.

Reveal Decline of Studebaker Wealth

Depression Wipes Out Once Big Fortune.

South Bend, Ind.—The decline of the fortunes of the house of Studebaker, once the city's first family, has just been revealed.

In a modest frame house Col. George M. Studebaker and his wife, head of the clan and one-time master and mistress of a great gray-stone castle, are weathering out the lean, depression years.

Gone is the enormous Studebaker fortune, which dated from the time the forbears of the present family started a little wagon factory here, nearly 100 years ago. The millions that piled up when the Studebaker factory turned to the manufacture of automobiles have vanished.

Today the woman who ruled as arbiter of South Bend society and moved in the first social circles of New York and Chicago is living with her husband upon the charity of close friends.

The Studebakers live in a small white-painted house on a quiet South Bend residential street. Mrs. Studebaker, whose hands are more accustomed to pouring tea into dainty cups of porcelain than handling brooms and mops, helps with the daily household routine.

A maid who cooks the meals does most of the housework, but many of the homely tasks fall upon Mrs. Studebaker.

Family Loss Near $6,000,000.

The story of the scars left by the depression upon the Studebaker fortune differs only in degree from that of thousands of typical American families trapped by the treacherous declines of the security markets.

Close friends of the family estimate the losses of Colonel Studebaker and his brother, the late Clement Studebaker, Jr., at about $6,000,000. Most of the loss came in the terrific collapse of the Insull utilities empire, in which the family had a heavy stake.

The Studebakers had been closely allied with Insull in his spectacular rise to fame and power.

A few weeks ago Colonel Studebaker filed a petition in bankruptcy. He showed liabilities of $2,000,000, assets of $2,000 and about $35 in cash. Notes of other investors, which the colonel and his brother signed, added to their heavy losses.

Give Up Palatial Home.

When the bankruptcy action was filed the Studebakers moved from their ancestral home on the knoll at Tippecanoe place. It was a massive, 30-room mansion of stone built by the colonel's father. The antiques and heirlooms of the family were left behind to help satisfy claims of creditors.

At this home the Studebakers had constantly entertained for large groups of friends. In the city the couple was known as kindly and democratic. Comrades of the colonel's Spanish war days were invited to camp on the extensive grounds of the estate.

Now the couple live in strict retirement. They see only a few of their closest friends. But those who have visited the couple in their modest quarters, report them still cheerful and smiling, despite hardships to which they are unaccustomed.

"Folks have been mighty kind," they say. "After all, that's what counts."

Farmer Furnishes Refuge for Snakes

Weatherford, Okla.—A veritable snake's paradise where the reptiles live unmolested and feed on insects and mice in thick underbrush and grass has been established by J. M. Kroeker, a farmer.

None is permitted to disturb the reptiles in their retreat. For more than three years Kroeker has been driving all the snakes he finds on his quarter section of land into the small cottonwood grove.

He kills only rattlesnakes and will allow none of this variety to enter the retreat. Kroeker said that the snakes are invaluable for destroying the mice and insects on his farm and that this fact is his reason for encouraging their presence.

Visitors report that some of the reptiles, particularly the bull-snakes, have attained immense size. Some are said to have been on the farm since Kroeker moved there 30 years ago.

BEAUTY TALKS

MARJORIE DUNCAN

MAKE-UP WEARS WELL

WE HAD a complete series of lessons in the home facial. And—since no treatment, whether at home or in a salon is complete without the finishing touches—we will start today a series of lessons in make-up.

First, let us dispel several wrong conceptions—the better to understand the why and wherefore of make-up and its proper application. Happily, the groundless superstition that make-up is a wicked art is fast fading away. Partly because natural make-up is the vogue, we are striving for that rosy, healthy quality of color that is natural—not the bold, artificial, too-too obviously rouged look. There's another reason why the old-fashioned notion (that make-up is bad), is losing favor. Both men and women prefer it. They have seen it make a magical and delightful change in wan, depressed, listless looking faces.

Perhaps the reason make-up was once considered wrong is the fact that in the past too many women applied it too badly. Wrong colors were used—dead white powder for instance. Faces looked clownish. Vivid rouge—and only one or two shades. Now there are as many rouge shades as there are skin tones. There's still another reason for the uncomplimentary reputation make-up once won. And that is: too many young girls and women rely on powder and rouge to cover up blemishes instead of giving the body and the skin the necessary care to keep the blemishes away and to preserve a smooth, clear, fine and healthy skin.

In other words, make-up in itself cannot give you a beautiful complexion if you haven't a flawless skin to start with. But make-up can make doubly beautiful the skin that is systematically cared for, properly cleansed, toned and nourished every single day of our lives.

And this is one detail I want particularly to emphasize. Make-up will wear better on a clean and healthy skin. That is why beauty authorities tell you repeatedly: cleanse your skin before retiring. Cleanse again in the morning. Remove all make-up before applying a fresh dusting of powder or dab of rouge. If every woman stopped to give herself a quick facial before applying make-up, it would not be necessary to renew powder and rouge so many times—make-up wears better, and looks better on a clean, cared-for skin.

FINISHING CREAM

DRY skin needs a finishing cream—one that has a little oil in it to keep the skin lubricated and ward off any drying effect of powder, rouge or even exposure to the elements. But that does not mean a very greasy cream—encouraging shine and an unwholesome, oily appearance. In applying your finishing cream, remember that a little is enough. Use it sparingly and blend it carefully over face and neck, with the same movements you used for applying the cleansing and nourishing creams—upward and outward. Remember? Now with a cleansing tissue blot to remove any excess. Be especially careful to remove excess from around the eyes and nose.

If your skin is oily there is no need to burden it with a cream. There are delightful finishing lotions on the market. They give a velvety quality to the skin—soft, transparent, fresh-looking. And these lotions usually keep powder and rouge doubly clingy, warding off shine (women complaining of "shining nose" please note).

Seasonal changes come in for their share of consideration when foundation preparations are up for discussion. For in the summer, there is less complaint in general about "dryness." In the winter, on the other hand, even the normal skin tends to be somewhat dry. That is why the lotions are more popular during the summer and the creams during the winter.

Yet, even during the winter months—or should I say especially during the winter months?—the lotions are more popular for evening wear. Also if a more lasting make-up is desired. If you should be making a train trip, visiting a friend, or preparing for a busy round of social engagements the lotion is preferable. Master the art of applying it skillfully. Moisten a pad of absorbent cotton in cold water. Now pour a little of the lotion on the cotton. Shake the bottle thoroughly if directions say so. Work quickly. Pat face and neck and before the lotion has a chance to dry, smooth and blend very evenly with the fingers. If you let the lotion dry in patches before smoothing and blending—well, you won't have that nice finish I've talked about.

The young, fresh, fine and firm, perfectly normal skin needs no foundation cream or lotion. Skin tonic can serve that purpose.

With standards of personal loveliness going higher and higher our modern woman must look as perfectly groomed on an ordinary day as her forbears did on the very special occasions. And on the special occasions our modern woman surpasses even her own ideals of beauty.

Important Question

Washington.—I believe the question most frequently heard in Washington these days is: "Now that we have this new deal, how is it going to be untangled?" And it occurs to me that it is about the most important question before this government today. A chemist can mix constituent parts of a formula or a prescription, but he never can undo what he has done. Thus, while the new deal has not changed the physical characteristics of things, as a chemist would do in mixing a formula, the job of getting this country settled down is one of such magnitude that the untangling of the skein is going to require something more than patience.

Consider the farm adjustment program. Or the NRA. Or look into the uprooting of commerce and industry by the various banking changes and currency and gold maneuvers that have taken place. And last, but by no means least, examine the rapidly growing pile of obligations that constitute what we know as our public debt.

With reference to the public debt, it should be stated that this country, after the World war and its devastation and animosities had been shaken off, proceeded to pay off its public debt at an amazing rate. After the end of the war when the debt was at its peak, the government owed a total of $26,550,000,000. It stands today roughly at $23,400,000,000. In between those two dates, when the country was prosperous and income taxes and other taxes were yielding their fullest, the debt once was whittled down to about $16,500,000,000. So those who watch over the public debt say they entertain no fears; that when conditions are prosperous again there will be taxes to pay off the debt and that no one will complain about the vast sums now being spent if the result is prosperity.

This payment of the public debt, however, is to my mind considerably less of a tangle, a problem, with which to deal, than the farm adjustment scheme on which Secretary Wallace and his Agricultural department folks are laboring. It seems likely, from Mr. Wallace's calculations, that the country's acreage of harvested crops next year will be at least 30,000,000, and may be 35,000,000, acres below the average acreage of crops planted and harvested annually in recent years. Emergency adjustment plans are responsible. They are predicated upon a basis contemplating control of production, a restriction against a surplus that would force prices down.

Mr. Wallace is profoundly convinced that this course will be extremely helpful to the farmers. He sees better returns to them and he sees greater peace of mind, which after all is not to be dismissed lightly, among the farm folks of the country.

But that is the immediate picture. What of the future? Or to quote again the oft-repeated question: "how is it going to be untangled?" My own conviction is that in the urge to get some relief out to the farm belt, too little attention has been paid to the future status of the entire commodity production areas of the nation that can be called farm land.

Like a Game of Chess

To show how far-reaching the farm adjustment program is, it is only necessary to state that every crop thus far considered is one constituting a "key" in the commodity structure. These key crops—cotton, wheat, corn, etc.—occupy more than 1,900,000,000 acres. To change that layout, Secretary Wallace admits, is just like a game of chess. When you make one move, you are immediately faced with another, and so on.

By removing wheat as a production from one square mile or one portion of a county, attention must immediately be given to the question of to what use that land can be put. It is obvious that it cannot be allowed to grow only weeds. So there must be a stop-gap crop of some kind, some crop that will not compete with wheat, or with corn or with cotton or the other crops on which production control is being attempted.

As an example, out in western Kansas, they have developed after years of trial and experiment, a new kind of sorghum cane. It is no longer the tall, slender stalk of yore but a short stalk not unlike wheat that has a heavy head of grain, or seed, as you choose to describe it. It can be produced for about 14 cents a bushel, and farmers are flocking to its use. It takes care of the land made vacant by withdrawal of wheat, but it presents a competitor for both wheat and corn.

Or, if the vacant land is turned to grass, you at once start live stock industry to expanding there and the government is trying to hold down live stock production so that those who devote their land to live stock will get a fair return. Such is the story all through the list. It is not easy, and I think any fair-minded person will admit it. No professor, however learned, is going to solve that problem without careful thought and exceedingly cautious moves.

Admitting my own inability to forecast the result and an equal lack of capacity to find anyone who has suggested the answer, I cannot refrain from calling attention to one possibility: the new deal has set out upon a policy that cannot avoid revision of our entire economic structure and, it now appears, it may lead even to a re-settlement of the United States. That means, of course, that folks who devote their lives to live stock raising will have to move to the areas where they can do that, and the corn growers will have to get into that bailiwick, or some such new alignment. I confess I do not know what drastic changes can be accomplished without dislocating the lives and the hopes of farmers, but to me it is a decidedly interesting question over which to ponder as the long winter nights wear on.

* * *

The Big Puzzle

The country still seems to be trying to figure out what was the cause of the recent drastic treasury reorganization. The changes came so quickly and without any warning note that it was a move amounting to lightning from a clear sky. And now the observers here are trying to figure out its meaning in the fullest sense.

I watched the country's leading newspapers closely for several days after the President announced that Secretary Woodin was going on a long leave of absence in search of health, that Dean Acheson was resigning as undersecretary, and that Henry Morgenthau, Jr., was being moved over as undersecretary of the treasury, from the post of governor of the farm credit administration. Being undersecretary, he immediately became acting secretary when Mr. Woodin left for Arizona in his search for health. The newspapers were at wide variance on their views. Some of them held, editorially and in their news columns, that inflationists had taken the treasury under their wing and that we were headed straight into the grievous mistake that Germany made on her currency. Others took the position that Mr. Woodin was not a "yes" man and that Mr. Acheson was not in sympathy with the various maneuvers to which Mr. Roosevelt was lending his support, and that the President simply cleaned house.

Whatever the reason was, it remains as much of a secret as ever. The one thing upon which Washington observers seem to agree and the feeling was reflected in many large newspapers, was that Mr. Acheson was the "goat." Mr. Roosevelt wanted Mr. Morgenthau in the treasury and wanted him to run the place while Mr. Woodin was away, and the only way to accomplish it was to get rid of Mr. Acheson. That certainly happened.

The President, in announcing the changes, said it was necessary to have a man of more experience in the treasury than Mr. Acheson since Mr. Woodin was going to be absent.

* * *

Make Millions of Jobs

The President is seeking to develop the government's work relief program so that it will be operating on its most extensive scale coincident with what is logically expected to be the peak of unemployment this winter. His program to add $400,000,000 to the public works funds and take idle persons off the relief rolls for those jobs is well under way. It no doubt will make several million jobs available for a short time at least.

It is the President's thought that where persons have been on relief rolls, they will gladly take a job and work regularly if they are paid a little more than the relief doles they were receiving. He contends that people prefer work generally to being fed on a charity basis. And as far as I can learn, no one disputes the idea. Certainly, the person who is working and is being paid for it regains self-respect which so many times is lost when charitable organizations have to care for him and his family.

There is one aspect of the program for making work, however, that seems to have been generally overlooked. The proposition contemplates wide development of roads and highways in all parts of the nation. State road supervisors are going to make and, indeed, are now making, plans and listing projects in the numerous counties where work of a worthwhile nature can be done. This plan places the jobs close to the source of need, right in the locality where men are out of jobs.

* * *

While we are discussing the problems of the new deal, it seems pertinent to call attention to how advancement of science in commerce and industry add problems with which the professors must cope. For example, the bureau of fisheries of the Department of Commerce has just discovered a way to make oysters shuck themselves. There are thousands of men, and women, too, who annually add to their incomes by shucking oysters along the rivers and at the ports where the oyster boats come in. The discovery of a method for self-shucking of oysters will throw a good many of them out of jobs this winter, if the plan works as the bureau says it will work.

Jury Declares Hen Suicide; Frees Negro

Chattanooga, Tenn.—Because a criminal court jury decided that a hen in a poultry car committed suicide, James Clark, negro, was a free man today.

Clark, on trial before Judge Charles Luks for attempting felony, was charged with attempting to steal a chicken from a Southern railway car. Shally Wise, attorney for the negro, argued that the chicken which railway detectives found with its neck pulled through a wire screen on the side of the freight car was not pulled out by Clark, but was trying to escape.

The state was represented by Assistant Attorney General John Lively, Jr. The defense scoffed at his objections to the idea of a chicken trying to commit suicide.

HUNT IS PLANNED FOR MEXICAN GOLD

Legendary Treasure of Maximilian Sought.

Fort Worth, Texas.—A quest for the legendary treasure of Maximilian, ill-fated Nineteenth century emperor of Mexico, will be made on the wind-swept alkali plains of West Texas this fall.

As legend has it, the Austrian prince, who had been placed on the Mexican throne by Napoleon III of France in his quest for an empire, made plans to flee from Mexico when it became certain his feeble throne was tottering.

The emperor loaded a caravan of five wagons with his personal belongings, gold bars, and jewels of the royal family. The goal of the caravan was a gulf port, where the treasures were to be shipped to Europe. Maximilian was to follow.

Before Maximilian could flee he was executed. The caravan, already on its way under Maximilian's retainers, continued its journey, bent on delivering the treasure to Empress Carlotta, who had fled to Europe.

The caravan slipped across the Rio Grande into Texas. It disappeared somewhere in the interior.

Several years later, John Calvert, a surveyor posting a boundary line for a rancher, found the remnants of a wagon train almost entirely covered by sand. Level with the top of the sand he saw a chest.

In the chest was bar after bar of gold. Fearful to trust his finding in a bank, he left it hidden in the sand, going to it as he needed more gold.

That is the story he told Herbert Scheel, an automobile salesman, just before he died, according to Scheel. Calvert gave Scheel a map to the location and a general description of the spot, Scheel said.

This year Scheel will try to locate the treasure.

Canadian Tells Monster Story of Sea Monster

Montreal.—A strange story of a bluish green sea monster, described as being 80 feet long and having coils five feet thick, was related by travelers, who said that they had seen the creature in the Gulf of Georgia, off Vancouver island.

Reports on the monster, which was said to create a huge wash by its very movements in the sea, have been current for some time, but the latest came from Maj. W. H. Langley, a widely known barrister and clerk of the legislative assembly. He reported having seen it recently and confirmed the story of F. W. Kemp, who had seen it earlier.

"I was picnicking with my wife and sixteen-year-old son on Chatham island," said Kemp. "I thought at first it was just a tide rip. Then I was amazed to see huge coils come out of the top of the water like a snake. Judging by logs lying nearby, the total length of these coils must have been at least 80 feet and they were five feet thick, I should think. They came twisting out of the water so high that I could see light under them.

"They seemed a bluish green color, but shone in the sun like aluminum. The rear part of the creature was serrated with protuberances like dorsal fins."

Discovers "Ice Ceiling" 60 Miles Above Earth

Paris.—The existence of a peculiar "ice-ceiling" of frozen particles, 60 miles above the earth, which may be responsible for violent air currents resulting in storms at sea, was revealed as one of the important observations of the French Polar mission, recently returned from a year on the ice-cap of Greenland.

Naval scientists said they had been able to prove the existence and distance of the layer of ice particles by sending a spark up to the "ceiling" and recording the time it took "to bounce back."

Earthworm Ranks High in Scheme of Creation

After more than a quarter of a century of observation Charles Darwin in 1881 wrote his monograph on earthworms to prove that in all the scheme of creation mankind has no more valuable friends than these industrious delvers in the dark. Now, 52 years after Darwin, the United States biological survey gives information that the future of mankind depends very directly on the continued existence and activity of billions of earthworms. Without them there could be no vegetation, and without vegetation all the higher forms of animal life would become extinct.

Fertility of the soil depends on the presence of earthworms. The upper strata are constantly being disturbed and loosened by the worms so that the rain can penetrate; and in addition they pull down decaying vegetable matter into the soil. They are also active in reclamation work. Darwin observed how long it required for the worms to bury from sight an abandoned brick walk and begin the piling of fertility on top of it.

Aside from fishermen and robins the earthworms have very few enemies, and the prospect of their extermination is remote. For the present no prohibitory laws need be enacted against either robins or piscatorial sportsmen.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

NEW LAUNDRY SOAP BREAKS ALL RECORDS FOR FAST WASHING AND WHITE CLOTHES

Soaks Out Dirt In 15 Minutes,
Yet Is Utterly Harmless to Color, Fabric and Hands

NO time-saving, labor-saving development of recent years has brought forth such a chorus of approval as Procter & Gamble's amazing new Laundry Soap Discovery! Everywhere, after trying it women are exclaiming—"Will the wonders of science never cease?"

For this remarkable invention is an utterly new-type laundry soap. A soap that multiplies itself 500 TIMES in suds. Which means you get at least twice as much suds as from old-style soaps. A still faster-washing, still whiter-washing soap that's utterly SAFE for colors, fabrics, and hands.

This remarkable new discovery is called OXYDOL. And you'll find to your surprise that it makes other soaps —"granulated," bar or flake—hopelessly out-of-date.

Women believed they had the fastest soap already! Then found it was slow, alongside OXYDOL. For OXYDOL utterly banishes boiling. It ends washboard scrubbing. It cuts soaking time to 15 minutes—gets clothes out far sooner.

They believed they had the whitest washes they could possibly get. And are now amazed by washes 4 to 5 shades whiter than before.

By impartial scientific test, ONE washing with OXYDOL gets clothes whiter than 2 to 4 washes with other soaps. But that's not all!

You'll find clothes actually last longer, washed with this new soap. That the daintiest colors DO NOT fade. That it is easier on hands than any soap you've ever used. For no strong agents, no chemical bleaches are in OXYDOL. Just pure soap elements so blended with others as to protect clothes against fading. OXYDOL simply can't hurt anything clear water won't!

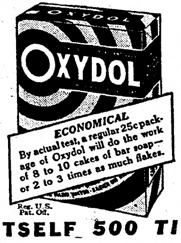
DISSOLVES Dirt—In Any Water, Hard or Soft

Its creamy, "free-acting" suds dissolve dirt out in 15 minutes. No boiling, no back-breaking scrubbing is necessary. Nor any "water-softener," either. For the right amount of water-softener is already there.

Different from ordinary soaps, OXYDOL is specially fitted to water conditions in each district where it is sold. The water in this district, for example, has been tested for "hardness" by expert chemists. The OXYDOL you buy here contains just the right proportion of "softener" to fit it.

With OXYDOL you'll do your wash in 25% to 40% less time. You'll get a whiter, sweeter-smelling wash than ever before. Everything will iron beautifully—no soap streaks or smudges anywhere. And you'll never be bothered with fading colors or red, soap-bitten hands.

These things we promise you. Whatever your former favorite, try OXYDOL next time you wash. You'll never go back to slower soaps or harsher soaps again! Procter & Gamble.



OXYDOL
ECONOMICAL
By actual test, a regular 25c package of Oxydol will do the work of 8 to 10 cakes of bar soap—or 2 to 3 times as much flakes.

RAMPAGING BEAR KEEPS PARTY ON ALERT TWO DAYS

Exploring Expedition Has Lively Time During Blizzard in Rockies.

New York.—How a grizzly on the rampage kept his party on the alert for two tense days while they were held captive in their tents by a blizzard in the Rocky mountains was told by James L. Clark, vice director in charge of preparation of the American Museum of Natural History.

Mr. Clark has just returned from an expedition sponsored by Alfred O. Berolzheimer for the collection of specimens, including antelope, elk and moose for scientific specimens. Mrs. Clark, who has tramped game trails from Africa to Alaska, was a member of the party.

The bear incident occurred in a remote region of the Rockies south of Yellowstone park, known as "the Thoroughfare." The expedition's camp had been established about a mile from a cabin occupied by Jack Theobaugh, a forest ranger who patrols that particular district.

Find Bear Tracks.

"One morning, less than half a mile from camp, we discovered bear tracks and from their size it was easy to deduce that he was a big fellow and no doubt of it," said Mr. Clark. "Inasmuch as the tracks came from the direction of the ranger's cabin, we followed them. When we got within earshot of the place we heard some of the fanciest 'cussin' the English language can produce.

"Next we saw a sign which should read 'U. S. Property—Do not Destroy Under Penalty of Punishment.' It had been painted on thick wood which had been torn to splinters and chewed to pulp.

"This was our first indication that a grizzly bent upon death and destruction, was on the rampage. When we reached the clearing in front of the ranger's cabin we saw Theobaugh ruefully surveying the damage done by the grizzly. Bed, chairs, table and other furnishings had been thrown out of the cabin and broken into kindling wood. The cabin door, made of inch-thick wood and reinforced by heavy strips of lumber, had been broken and thrown into the brush. Its iron hinges had been crumpled as though made of tinfoil. Flour, beans and other supplies were scattered all over the place."

A mischief-minded grizzly is a dangerous customer—even more so than a lion, according to Mr. Clark, and he has hunted both. A lion can be scared off because of his natural fear of man, but a grizzly holds no such inferiority complex.

"A grizzly will walk in where lions fear to tread," said Mr. Clark, "and it was up to us to deal with him before he attacked us. If the bear could do what he did to a log cabin, it needs no stretch of the imagination to figure out what he would do to canvas tents.

Blizzard Breaks Loose.

"But snow fell that afternoon. It turned into a mild-sized blizzard, accompanied by zero temperature and the hunt had to be abandoned. To protect ourselves against attack we placed our bacon and other delicacies that attract bears, in a tree and in such a manner that we would get warning if he tried to get at them. Then we loaded our rifles, closed our tent-flaps and waited for two days while the snow continued to fall. But nothing happened. Mrs. Clark was not alone cool, but disappointed. She was all set to bag the bear the minute he got into camp."

The Clark-Berolzheimer party hunted antelope along the Gray Bull river in the Big Horn basin, on the property of George J. Belden. On this, the largest ranch in Wyoming and as large as the state of Rhode Island, is a herd of about 3,000 antelope on which the game department of Wyoming declared open season this year because of the damage done to crops and also to eliminate some 500 old bucks to improve the condition of the herd.

"But antelope do not make willing targets just because a hunter has a license to shoot them," said Mr. Clark. "They are wild and wary—speedy and suspicious. When their keen eyes spot the intruder, they are off like a puff of smoke. We also obtained two fine elks for the museum and a male and female of the increasingly rare Wyoming, or Shiras moose, of which the museum had no specimens. It was really these we went to get and they will form a valuable addition to the museum's American collections."

Fisherman Uses Line to Save Man From Drowning

Chico, Calif.—A fisherman lassoed a drowning man and pulled him to shore at the mouth of the Russian river, according to friends of the hero, C. A. Miles.

Miles was fishing when he saw a boat capsize in the ocean nearby. Two of the occupants escaped. The third, apparently dazed, was being carried out to sea when Miles cast his line around the drowning man's shoulders and pulled him to safety.

Parrot Gives Alarm

Bridgeport, Conn.—When a rubbish fire spread to a shed, a parrot owned by Frank Leone, spread the alarm. Polly, hung out in its cage for an airing, set up such a commotion when the fire spread that Leone rushed out to see what was wrong. He reported the fire and moved Polly to a safer place.

Keeping to Desired Weight

Thing to Remember in the Important Point of "Poundage" Is That It Is Most Unwise to Permit Health to Be Injured by Improper Diet.

Fashion's dictum as to feminine "curves" calls forth the following eminently sensible remarks from a woman whose newspaper and magazine contributions are widely read:

"Recently I had an experience which seems almost unbelievable in these days. In a group of five or six there were actually several persons who were bemoaning their weight, but this, of course, was not the surprising thing—they were bewailing the fact that they were under weight! Perhaps those of you who have been trying to keep down your poundage think this is a happy state. The contrary, however, is often the case. While figures are slender, bones may be too prominent, skin may wrinkle before its time, and energy may be low.

"It is really just as important to keep up to a normal weight, perhaps even more so than it is to keep down. What is normal weight? No one knows exactly what is the normal weight for an individual. Statistics have shown that average weight for height may be used for a general criterion. It has been shown that average weight for height increases with years. They have also shown that the average weight for thirty, considering height, is the best weight for persons below and above that age. Below that age it is therefore well to be slightly over average and if possible, after that age, to keep your weight at this stage.

"The condition of under weight, especially in the case of young girls, allows no reserve to be called upon in emergency. A severe attack of flu or pneumonia or typhoid fever will almost invariably have more serious consequences when this reserve is lacking. There has been a steady increase in the onslaughts of tuberculosis among young girls, some of whom are naturally thin and some of whom have partially starved themselves to retain or regain that 'more than slender' figure which is the ideal of today.

This matter of body weight still has an element of mystery for the nutritionists. While authorities on obesity state with confidence that overweight is merely a matter of eating too much, we all of us know persons whose diet is very low in calories and yet they continue to gain. We know others who may be even thinner than our ideal, who devour all of the foods they like best, in large quantities, but yet never seem to gain a pound. Perhaps the authorities know more and have greater interests in cases of real obesity where persons are fifty to a hundred or more pounds overweight than they do about the question of a small excess of fat.

"In any case the foundation diet for every person, under weight or overweight, or normal, is the same. There must be plenty of fruits and vegetables, some milk, eggs several times a week and some meat or food of this type each day. Extra calories are added by fats in the form of butter, cream or oils, by sugars in the form of very sweet desserts and candies, by starches in the form of breads and cereals. The person who is under weight should increase the amount of milk, butter and eggs, rather than increase the amount of sugars and starches enormously. The person who is overweight may safely cut down on the latter foods; however, both of them must be sure of adequate amounts of minerals and vitamins as well as protein every day. Both of them will be wise to formulate a regular plan and, which is much harder, stick to it. Neither gain or loss of weight is accomplished in a few weeks. Persons on any sort of a diet must be sure of keeping enough roughage in the daily meal plan for the sake of better digestion. Vegetables, fruits and whole-grain cereals supply this most plentifully."

"The aid of a physician should be sought if the problem is at all serious. There may be a high or low metabolism which can be regulated by certain gland extracts, which, however, must never be taken except under the direction of a doctor."

Perfect Wash Depends on Right Kind of Soap

By RUBY BAKER

Washday would be much more pleasant, housewives declare, if they could always be sure of a wash that's white and sweet and fresh.

Yet, with a hundred and one different kinds of soaps on the market, there are still plenty of women who hang out dingy, gray-looking clothes in spite of all their efforts.

Rule Number One for making sure of getting the kind of wash you can take real pride in is this—insist on a high-grade, quality soap.

It's not the shape or size of a soap that counts, but the cleaning power and actual washing help it gives you. You may find that some soaps bring you so little washing ability that they make more work for you. And they turn out a disappointing wash. What's more, the hard rubbing you have to do shortens the life of the clothes.

A good second rule to keep in mind is that the color of soap has nothing to do with the whiteness of your clothes.

Whiteness depends on cleanness—and the soap that has more cleaning power is the one that will bring you the snowiest washes.

Growth and Seasons

Healthy children gain weight more slowly during April, May and June than at any other time, and gain it fastest in the fall and early winter. On the other hand, increases in height come fastest in the months when increase in weight is slow.

A study just completed by Dr. Clair E. Turner and members of the public health research laboratory of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology revealed these facts. In the Southern Hemisphere the seasons of fast and slow growth are reversed.—Literary Digest.

HEROES REST IN MARSHY SOIL OF OLD LOUISIANA?

A persistent legend which has become part of Louisiana folklore isn't legend at all to the natives who live along Barataria bayou. In this picturesque marshy country, about twenty miles south of New Orleans, the natives are convinced that Napoleon does not sleep in Les Invalides and that John Paul Jones' great crypt at Annapolis honors an unknown sailor. They will reverently show the visitor three grass-covered graves, which, they announce with conviction, cover the ashes of the Little Corporal, of John Paul Jones, and of the pirate Lafitte.

It is, of course, historical fact that an expedition was organized to rescue Napoleon from St. Helena, but before the expedition under Dominique You sailed from New Orleans, Napoleon died. The Baratarians say different, however. They declare that all the activity of You's expedition was just huggermugger to conceal the fact that, while the show went on, Jean Lafitte was actually on his way to St. Helena. On the isle he substituted a man closely resembling Napoleon, and smuggled the ex-emperor off St. Helena. But when the sloop was almost within sight of Louisiana on the return trip, Napoleon died, and Lafitte buried him at Barataria.

As to Jones—they insist that the great admiral joined Lafitte's forces after his sea victories, instead of going to Yucatan as history tells us, that he died at sea on an expedition and was buried beside Napoleon. The body buried at Annapolis is just some other fellow, identified only by a navy uniform coat. Skeptical visitors may smile, but the Baratarians —some of whom claim to be direct descendants of Lafitte—cross themselves devoutly before the graves and heap them high with flowers every All-Soul's day.

Town's First Citizen Bandit King by Night

The antithesis of Hugo's story of Jean Valjean, who went to the galleys for stealing a loaf of bread and, escaping, became a revered town mayor, has been sent from Belgrade. A mayor of sixty in the town of Gornje Selo has just been exposed as head of a dangerous band of robbers which for years has been eluding police sent by the same mayor in pursuit of them.

For seventeen years respected Janjo Korac, father of six children, had been mayor of Gornje Selo. For many years he had accumulated wealth as leader of the band of robbers. A question on politeness undid him. He ceased to raise his hat in answer to greetings. Inquisitiveness penetrated the barrier of honor and reverence, and the townspeople discovered that their mayor was keeping his hat on to conceal a wound inflicted in a night-time encounter with his own police.

Wood for Paper Making

At the present time there are only a few species of trees that are used for paper making, says the American Tree association. We are finding new ways of utilizing additional species, but two-thirds of our pulp comes from spruce, fir, and hemlock. These three species supply practically all the raw material from which the coarse paper used for newspapers is made. Pasteboard and coarse wrapping and packing papers are made from pine wood. Most of the finer grades of paper that are used for magazines and books are from poplar and other hardwood trees.

NO AUTOCRATIC RULE IN RUSSIA

Supreme Authority Vested in All-Union Congress.

When President Roosevelt addressed the head of the Soviet government, inviting him to designate a representative to discuss matters affecting the two countries, the attention of Americans was drawn to the unique character of the governmental system which is centralized at Moscow. Few persons had heard of Michael I. Kalinin, but it was commonly assumed that he was "President" of the Soviet republic. His office is, in fact, that of chairman of the central executive committee, which wields final authority when the all-union congress, the supreme organ of authority, is not in session.

The all-union congress is composed of about 2,000 members representing town and township soviets and provincial councils. The congress meets at least once every two years. During recess its powers are exercised by the central executive committee, composed of two chambers, the council of the union (450 members) and the council of nationalities (139 members). The committee works through a presidium of 27 members, which exercises full authority when the committee is in recess. The central executive committee elects the members of the people's council of commissars, which serves as the executive body of the Soviet union, answerable to the central committee and its presidium.

The only legalized political organization in the Soviet union is the Communist party. Its principal body is a central committee, which in turn elects a political bureau. The secretary of this bureau is Joseph Stalin. Naturally, the Communist party enjoys extraordinary powers, which are concentrated in the "Politburo" dominated by its secretary.

The constituent republics of the Soviet Union are the Russian, White Russian, Ukrainian, Transcaucasian, Turkoman, Uzbek and Tajikistan. There are 12 additional autonomous republics, and 13 autonomous areas. The population of the entire Soviet Union is about 168,000,000, with 182 different nationalities speaking 149 languages. The Soviet Union covers an area of 8,144,228 square miles, as compared with the area of the United States, 3,738,395 square miles.

Bible Chapters Alike

The two chapters in the Bible which are often stated to Isaiah and are the 37th chapter of Isaiah and the 19th chapter of II Kings. They are not exactly alike, but there is very little difference. The 37th chapter of Isaiah has 38 verses, while the 19th chapter of II Kings contains only 37. Also large portions of the second chapter of Ezra and the seventh chapter of Nehemiah are identical. Two Psalms which are substantially alike are the 14th and the 53rd.

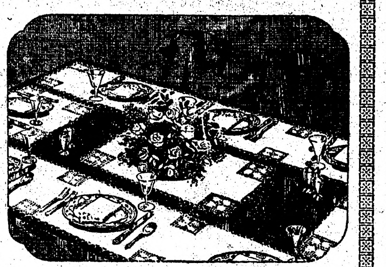
The Bride Gives a Lunch



MODERN women are very feminine persons, after all. And the bride of today is just as breathless to invite her crowd of gay young people to her new home and strut her culinary stuff as was her grandmother. But, instead of being a bit panicky about the merits of hot biscuits, pies and that first home-made cake, the modern bride has qualms that center about the perfect arrangement of hors d'oeuvres, the consistency of salad dressings and that oft-unknown quantity — mousse. Her dishes require less labor in the kitchen, but they must be as "simply perfect" as those that evoked the "ohs" and "ahs" of generations ago.

Being "Correct"

The time is set for one. The traditional luncheon table is set with centerpiece or runner and place mats of lovely linen, needlework and lace. The centerpiece is either flowers or some decorative ornament, and flower or candy dishes at the corners of the table. Candles are for use at dinner, and sunlight is preferable for luncheon, if possible. The places are set as for dinner, but the smaller luncheon napkin is used. Four courses are sufficient, but five are permissible. The following menu is simple but smart, and it is worthy of meditation:

Piquant Vegetable Cocktail
Mushrooms and Eggs a la King
Lattice Potatoes
Artichoke Hearts Parisien
Frozen Raspberries
Tiny Iced Cakes
Demi-Tasse

Frozen Raspberries are made by using the contents of a No. 2 can of red raspberries. Mash raspberries, remix with the juice, add juice of one lemon, one-half cup sugar and one and one-half cups water. Bring to boiling to melt the sugar. Cool and freeze, using three parts ice to one part salt.*

Newfolden Has Best Record In County For Paid-In Taxes

The village of Newfolden holds the best tax paying record for 1933 among Marshall county municipalities with 95 per cent of the tax levy in the village being already paid, according to P. E. Kvikstad, county treasurer who has compiled for the villages of the county the percentage of taxes paid.

Strandquist with 84 per cent had the next best record for taxpaying among the municipalities while the lowest percentage of collections was in the village of Oslo with only 52 per cent of the levy being paid in at the present time, Mr. Kvikstad stated. In Warren 78.5 per cent of the tax levy was paid in by local taxpayers.

The percentages paid in other municipalities of Marshall county follow: Grygla, 81 per cent; Middle River, 59 per cent; Stephen, 83.8 per cent; Alvarado, 72.8 per cent; Holt, 65 per cent and Viking, 81.3 per cent.

National Cheese Week

Governor Olson joined with governors of other dairying states in behalf of National Cheese Week. The campaign, which is national in scope, aims to eliminate the 30,000,000 pound cheese surplus, with the consequent bringing about of better prices for dairy farmers.

Other governors participating with Governor Olson on the project are Scheedeman of Wisconsin, Langar of North Dakota, and Herring, of Iowa. The state department of agriculture reports that Minnesota produces about 10,000,000 pounds of cheese annually, with 58 cheese factories operating in the state.

A group of young folks from here enjoyed a sleighing trip to Strandquist Saturday evening, where they were entertained at the Hougard home. They were: Orrin Clarin, and Greta Fredrickson, Eunice Lindholm, and Johnny Doran.

Erling Swenson Appointed State Conservation Head

Erling Swenson, Minneapolis attorney, was appointed director of the game and fish division of the Minnesota Department of Conservation to succeed W. D. Stewart of St. Paul, who died.

E. V. Willard, conservation commissioner, who made the appointment, also named Fred W. Eiden of Princeton to the newly created position of office assistant in charge of personal for the conservation department. Both appointments are effective December 15.

In three changes in game and fish personnel, effective the same date, Louis Enstrom, deputy director since January, in 1931, will undertake a conservation survey in northern Minnesota; Charles MacFarlane, seizure clerk, will become deputy director, and Anthony M. Stefano will take over MacFarlane's old duties in addition to his own work.

Commenting on the changes, Mr. Willard said he was particularly pleased at Mr. Swenson's acceptance of appointment, "because of the background he brings to his new work." His background: University of Minnesota law graduate, 1912; 21-year law practice in Minneapolis; ten years in the Legislature, three terms in the House, one in the Senate, during which he served on game and fish and public domain committees.

Mr. Eiden, 34 years old, University of Minnesota graduate, has been priciple of Princeton senior high school six years.

15 More Game Wardens In State To Lose Jobs

Fifteen game wardens, including three of the oldest in service, who have been "holdovers" under the present Farmer-Labor administration, and ten Farmer-Labor appointees, will be furloughed indefinitely Friday by the game and fish division as another step in its move for economy.

Previously ten wardens, eight of whom were "holdovers" were furloughed as of December 1. Another warden, Roy Rice of Bemidji, will be given a leave of absence for two months at his own request.

Although the list of wardens was not released by E. V. Willard, head of the state department of conservation who declined to make public the names "in fairness to the men" the list of wardens to be furloughed today was obtained from another source.

The three oldest wardens who will be placed on furlough are Walter Klinefelter of Stillwater, Wm. F. Munch of Crookston and Sheridan Greig of Danbury.

Other "holdover" wardens and wardens that have been appointed since January 1931 who are to be furloughed, are spread out at different points in the state according to the addresses given after their names on the list.

It is expected several more wardens than the 25 just furloughed, will be given furloughs in the next two weeks until the force has been reduced to 45 men, made necessary because of depleted funds. Louis Enstrom, acting director of game and fish, recently stated that several men furloughed will be returned to the force as soon as division finances permit.

Small Crowd Attended Telephone Meeting

Very few people came in last Thursday evening to attend the big telephone meeting that was scheduled for that night for the purpose of discussing the telephone situation here. Only two patrons of the north line and three of the Excel line were in for the hearing. None from the east line appeared and only a few from the village.

Thomas Vollom, president of the Garden Valley Telephone Co. at Erskine and Hans Olson, who owns the Viking Telephone Co. were here and discussed ways and means of improving the local system if, the owners and patrons only would show some interest. Not much can be done if those whom own shares in the different lines coming in here, do not say which way they wish to have the system go—closed—pay up and run it under the present system or, sell out.

As the facts were brought out at the meeting it seems that each individual does not have so much to sell. One thing is sure and that is, that unless some action is taken quick, the board here will be forced to close the local central exchange as the railroad and warehouse commission will not allow the company to operate at a loss and not pay its operators.

Take action now and let your neighbor know what you want to do—reorganize one company and get service—pay up and run under present system—sell out—close by order or local option—or lets say put it away and be done, but don't forget someone has to pay the outstanding debts.

Middle River Had Big Fire

Middle River had another big fire on Wednesday that destroyed a quarter block of good buildings. Those who suffered losses in the fire were J. B. Grobey, who lost his entire restaurant and beer parlor; the Shoberg Estate, who owned a big double-front store; and Dick Shoberg, who lost his machine shed and auto establishment.

The fire started around the chimney in the Grobey place and spread so fast that none of the equipment or stock could be saved. The Middle River fire department, under the direction of M. P. Gullickson, fire chief, held the fire down pretty good and kept it from spreading to the nearby buildings.

Just recently Middle River had another big fire when the Rex Cafe burned down, causing a total loss to the owner, Mrs. Hallquist.

Jermon Johnson Died

A crowd that filled the church basement to capacity, attended the Sewing Circle sale and lunch at the Free Mission church on Friday evening. The proceeds from the doings amounted to about a hundred dollars.

19,500 Deer Estimated Shot During Past Season

It is estimated by officials of the Division of Game and Fish, Minnesota Department of Conservation, that the five-day open season for the legal taking of deer in nine northern counties which ended recently resulted in the taking of 19,500 deer. This figure is based on the premise that 25,000 deer hunting licenses were sold, reports covering the sale not as yet being completed. It will be sometime in January before the actual sale number will be definitely known.

To date reports have been received from 5,972 licensees with 4,655 deer reported killed. This is a ration of 78 per cent, indicating an abundance of deer in most of the open territory.

Al Smith Joins "Tories" Who Demand Sound Dollar—Opposition to Roosevelt's Monetary Policy Grows—Californians Lynch Two Murdering Kidnapers.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

MORE loudly every day is heard the demand for a return to the "sound money" by the increasing number of those whom the President has termed "tories"; for, as the time for the assembling of congress nears there is a fast growing fear that the inflationists in that body will move for the starting of the money printing presses. Between the "tories" and the inflationists stands Mr. Roosevelt, still seemingly unperturbed, insisting on carrying out further his gold trading plan for devaluing the dollar and thus increasing commodity prices, with some form of stabilization to follow—either a gold standard devalued dollar or a commodity price index paper dollar.

Alfred E. Smith

That the dispute over the President's monetary policy is not partisan is emphasized by the stand taken by Alfred E. Smith in an open letter written for the December issue of the New Outlook but released to the press in advance.

Mr. Smith expressed his disbelief that "the Democratic party is fated to be always the party of greenbackers, paper money printers, free silverites, currency managers, rubber dollar manufacturers, and crackpots."

He added that if this is to be so "the issue is more than a partisan one, because we are dealing today with the party which actually holds responsible government office, which is not merely advocating cure-alls in a campaign, but which has in its hands the present welfare of 130,000,000 people and the future of our most cherished American institutions. . . .

"What we need in this country is absolute dependability in our money standards. It is the only thing which will restore confidence. The latest fiscal moves of the administration have undermined public confidence. They have created uncertainty.

"Uncertainty paralyzes business, discourages private initiative, drives money into hiding, and places the entire burden of sustaining the population on the central government.

"In the absence of anything definitely known to be better, I am for a return to the gold standard. I am for gold dollars as against baloney dollars. I am for experience as against experiment. If I must choose between private management of business and management of a government bureaucracy, I am for private management.

"I am ready to go through a certain amount of deflation if the choice is between this and outright money inflation. If I must choose between the leaders of the past, with all the errors they have made and with all the selfishness they have been guilty of, and the inexperienced young college professors who hold no responsible public office, but are perfectly ready to turn 130,000,000 Americans into guinea pigs for experimentation. I am going to be for the people who have made the country what it is. And I say this with full knowledge of the fact that there are many things in the old order of society which I should like to have changed and which I do not applaud or even condone."

AS HAD been expected, Prof. O. M. W. Sprague, special adviser to the treasury, resigned, and in doing so he told the President, once his pupil at Harvard, that the Roosevelt dollar depreciation policy not only will fail to raise prices substantially in the absence of trade recovery but will ruin the credit of the government and precipitate an inflation panic. "I believe," Sprague said in his letter, "you are faced with the alternative either of giving up the present policy or of the meeting of government expenditures with additional money."

Prof. O. M. W. Sprague

Having finally lost all hope that the President might be persuaded to change his course before it is too late, Professor Sprague said he was resigning to take the field against the Roosevelt policy, believing that the last chance of averting a currency inflation debacle lies in arousing public opinion.

Another of the President's financial advisers, though unofficial, James P. Warburg, New York banker, joins with Sprague in protest against the present monetary policies. Like the professor, he will undertake to arouse public opinion against them. This he announced at a meeting of the American Academy of Political Science in Philadelphia. At the same meeting Prof. Irving Fisher, Yale economist, said the President's monetary policy was "substantially right"; and Senator Thomas of Oklahoma asserted that he was opposed to inflation, which will cause general surprise.

Members of the advisory council of the federal reserve board, composed of prominent bankers in each federal reserve district, met in Washington and adopted a resolution favoring the re-establishment of the currency on a gold basis, together with safeguards to be agreed upon by international action. The resolution was circulated privately among all the member banks in the federal reserve system.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT himself made no comment on Mr. Smith's letter, but it drew from General Johnson, NRA administrator, who was at Warm Springs, a characteristically violent burst of denunciation. The general also made an unwarranted attack on Professor Sprague, calling him a "hitherto obscure professor" who "by a dramatic resignation obtained his little hour or two to strut across the stage." This of a man whom the Bank of England had been paying $25,000 a year to act as its adviser until the President persuaded him to come home and serve our treasury in a like capacity for $10,000 a year.

Al Smith's influence among Democrats is not to be denied, but the supporters of the President sought to lessen the effect of Smith's statement by the assertion that he is and always has been allied with Wall street. Senator Borah came out of the silence to dispute Smith's arguments. Raymond Moley, former assistant secretary of state, also came to the front with a question that seems to require an answer. Said he:

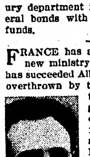
"Some one has to fix the price of gold; why shouldn't it be the United States?

"For years the Bank of England has fixed the price of gold and no one ever howled. Now that the President has decided to have the United States fix the price, why should there be any objections?

"There were no complaints when England was forcing its pound down from $4.86 to $3.25, thus pushing the dollar up. Why should there be complaints now that President Roosevelt has forced the pound back up, regaining the international trade that was being diverted to Great Britain by the decline of the pound?"

ACTING Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau replied to criticisms by saying that "the credit of the United States is as good as the Rock of Gibraltar"; but at the same time he let it be known that, in order to bolster up the prices of government securities, which have been dropping, the Treasury department itself would buy federal bonds with some of its surplus funds.

FRANCE has a new premier and a new ministry. Camille Chautemps has succeeded Albert Sarraut, who was overthrown by the chamber of deputies, and has formed a government that includes fourteen of the former ministers, among these being Paul-Boncour, Daladier and Sarraut. In other respects his selections, it is asserted in Paris, bear the stamp of the influence of Edouard Herriot, and many believe the new cabinet is designed to prepare the way for the return of that veteran Socialist. Herriot was turned out of the premiership a year ago because he wanted to pay the war debt due the United States, and has refused to take part in the government until after December 15—the anniversary of his downfall and the date when another installment is due. After France has repeated its act of repudiation, Herriot probably will again become premier.



Camille Chautemps

Chautemps was unable to persuade the dissident Socialists and the left Republicans to enter his cabinet, so it is made up of so-called radical Socialists. This contributes to the probability of its early defeat in the chamber. Chief of the new figures in the cabinet is Paul Marchandeau, budget minister, who is close to Herriot. He at once began work on a program designed to protect the franc.

THOUSANDS of furious Californians stormed the jail at San Jose, fought a desperate battle with the police and dragged out Jack Holmes and Thomas Thurmond, confessed kidnapers and murderers of Brooke L. Hart, the young son of a prominent merchant, and hanged them to trees in the city park. Fifteen thousand persons, many of them women and children, witnessed the lynching and cheered on the mob. That any of the lynchers ever will be punished is highly improbable. The crime of the two victims was peculiarly diabolical and cold-blooded and it is likely even the authorities, unofficially, welcome this reversion to old-time vigilante methods of dispensing justice. Gov. James Rolph had refused to send troops to help the sheriff, and later when told of the lynching said:

"This is the best lesson that California has ever given the country. We showed the country that the state is not going to tolerate kidnaping!"

R. P. SABINE, a Ford motor dealer in Bethesda, Md., makes the sensational charge that Secretary of War Dern and other government officials are scheming to maintain the NRA boycott against Henry Ford despite the ruling of the controller general that Ford could not be excluded from government business. He asserts the officials are trying to prevent him from getting a contract to supply several hundred motor trucks needed by the conservation corps. Sabine's bid on the original proposals was the lowest, but he now says new bids have been asked for, and the new specifications require "not less than six cylinder" engines in the cars, whereas the old specifications required not less than four cylinders. The Ford trucks are all four and eight cylinder models.

GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR, chief of staff, in his annual report to Secretary of War Dern, declares that the army's strength is now "below the danger line." He warns that our military standing is seventeenth in world relative strength, and speaks of the "obvious state of unrest now prevailing throughout the world." The general's recommendations for increasing the army's efficiency include:

Gen. Douglas MacArthur

A boost in regular army enlisted strength from 120,000 to 165,000, with immediate exemption of the enlisted man from the 15 per cent government pay cut.

An expenditure of nearly $200,000,000 on aircraft, modernization and motorization of the field artillery, mechanization, anti-aircraft equipment and general motorization.

Maintenance of the National Guard at existing strength with 48 drill periods and two weeks' active training annually.

At least 120,000 reserve officers with two weeks' annual training for at least 30,000. At present there are 119,000 reserve officers but only 87,000 are eligible for active duty training.

Restoration of the 1932 instruction and personnel scale for the R. O. T. C and C. M. T. C.

LIEUT. COL. ABELARDO HERRERA, the hated chief of the Matanzas military district under the regime of former President Machado of Cuba, and four other former officers paid with their lives for the many murders of which they were accused. They were taken from San Severino castle at Matanzas, lined up before masked men and shot to death with machine guns. The five men had been prisoners since August 12, the day Machado was driven from the island. Chief of the crimes attributed to them was the killing of the five Alvarez brothers, prominent anti-Machado revolutionists, in 1932.

FOLLOWING his conference with Ambassador Welles in Warm Springs, President Roosevelt issued a formal statement concerning the Cuban situation which was designed to let President Grau know that the United States is not ready to recognize his government and will not do so unless he can persuade the island factions to cease their warring and agree among themselves.

Sumner Welles

The statement reiterated the administration's policy of recognizing any government, regardless of its partisan or factional color, which proved itself representative of its people and able to secure their support. But it was made clear that the present Cuban government, assailed as it has been by one revolutionary attempt after another, did not at present meet these conditions.

Mr. Roosevelt supplemented his statement by the announcement that, though Ambassador Welles would return to his post in Havana after visiting Washington, he would soon be replaced by Jefferson Caffery and would resume his former position as assistant secretary of state for Latin American affairs. This is in full accord with Mr. Welles' desires though he has been unwilling to retire from Havana under the heavy fire directed against him by the supporters of the Grau government.

SENATOR WAGNER and his national labor board were given another job when members of three unions in the Chicago stock yards went on strike and a complete tie-up of the great meat industry there was threatened. The strikers demanded a general return to the 1929 wage scale, which would mean an increase of about 50 per cent. The walkout threw 35,000 packing house employees into enforced idleness until the dispute could be settled.

WHEN the football season ended, University of Michigan emerged again the champion of the Big Ten. In the East Harvard defeated Yale in their annual contest, and the Army beat the Navy. Southern California whipped the Notre Dame team and Stanford beat University of California in the chief games on the west coast.

ERNEST W. GIBSON, who formerly was a congressman from Vermont, will go back to Washington to represent that state in the senate. He was appointed by Governor Wilson to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Porter H. Dale.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, is barred from becoming an acknowledged suitor because of conditions of her father's will that her husband must match her small fortune with his own. To do this, Jordan has a wild hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette. Jessica tells Jordan and Doctor White, her guardian, of an encounter she has with an ill-mannered sailor. Two Frenchmen, the comte De Corlay and his son Robert, claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A French sailor, Sebastien, also knows of the treasure, and is seeking it. A form of partnership is arranged between Tom and the De Corlays to prosecute the search.

Yet Jessica's life had been a sheltered one. Her mother had been the only child of an American missionary to the Society islands. As a little girl she had lived at the mission, where all contacts naturally were guarded, and at thirteen had been taken to San Francisco and placed in a girl's seminary, where she remained until the death of her mother three years later.

Captain Poole, her father, had then yielded to her entreaty that she be taken with him for a voyage aboard his vessel. He desired to make the better acquaintance of his daughter, and the companionship continued until the beginning of the last illness that compelled him to quit the sea.

Even aboard the big four-master Jessica's life had been no less insulated from evil infection. Warren Poole, a reader and thinker, and the student that some such men become, had devoted leisure moments to her education, though on lines scarcely included in a school curriculum. There had been few topics that he had tabooed. His exposition of social conditions had been wise, clear and clean, based on the protection of knowledge rather than that hazardous fortification which is the ignorance of innocence.

Jessica served tea and cakes, and a little later count de Corlay and Robert took their leave, the others walking with them through the woods to the cove where they had left their boat. Then Tom, who had fallen silent, went off ashore in the boat that he had borrowed from a friend, the storekeeper, whose guest he was. Doctor White had not seen fit to augment the febrile condition of the young man's heart by inviting him to stop upon the island.

When his callers had left, Doctor White slipped off into the woods. Jessica caught up with him just as he reached the point where he and Tom had exchanged their first words with the Frenchmen, and whither his steps now had led him through some subconscious agency.

The Whale was the shoreward bastion of the sunken reef charted as Corvette ledge. This formation never was exposed or even visible at the most extreme low tide, but was indicated by the big swells that combed and sometimes broke at a certain point of its outer third, the extremity of which was marked by a spar buoy.

"Hello," said the doctor, and spun round. "Now what the dickens brought me over here again?"

Jessica laughed. "That's easy, Gardy. You've been thinking, only you haven't thought it out."

"Clear as a clay bank. Well, what's the finished product?"

"That there's no reason why we shouldn't have a try for the Fourquet, too," said Jessica.

The doctor gave her an owlish stare. "Darned if I don't believe you're right, my dear."

"Well, why not?" asked Jessica. "After all, treasure hunting is an open game, and you knew the story of the sunken corvette before any of these others. Besides, she hit a ledge that juts out from the island that you now own."

"That constitutes about as good a claim as any of the others," agreed the doctor, "and it's got precedent with the Bahama conch blowers. Those pirate wreckers used to argue, 'She broke her back on our coral reef, so she's our meat.' Also, of course I was too polite to say so, but it looks to me as if the count's distinguished ancestor had been holding out a fistful on his august monarch. By all the rules of the game of war, as played in those days, the commander of a king's ship was supposed to turn in to the royal exchequer whatever he grabbed."

"That occurred to me," said Jessica. "Of course the count must have thought of it, but I should say that it was just one of several things he didn't see the need of telling us."

"Oh—so I wasn't the only one to have that hunch."

"No. But about the Fourquet. I think we might as well overhaul her now as any time, if only to save poor Tom his job on the paper and wasting what little money he's put by."

"Why yes," agreed the doctor mockingly. "Let's go right out and help ourselves."

"That would be best, I think. Besides, this sneak of a Sebastien might be more clever than the rest of them. You'll have to go to Bath tomorrow morning, Gardy, and get a diver with his gear. And be sure to make a signed and witnessed agreement that he is to work for pay and not on lay. I know a good deal about these things. I didn't sail with father nearly three years for nothing."

The doctor made a protesting gesture. "But, my dear girl, don't talk so glibly about spending money until you've something to go on."

"But I have," said Jessica, and looked out at the swell mounting over the point of greatest danger on the ledge.

"What do you mean, you have?"

"I mean, Gardy, that the only dangerous point of the Corvette ledge to vessels of ordinary draught is the corvette herself."

"What?"

"Just that, Gardy. She was wedged firmly there bottom up and partly petrified and crusted with barnacles and covered with a heavy mass of kelp long before we had any coast and geodetic survey. At uncommonly low tides, with a heavy ground swell running, you can see the big brown skate-like mass of it just under the surface, in the trough."

"That's impossible—absurd! It all has been sounded out."

"A sounding lead would clink on her the same as on a rock," said Jessica. "Her timbers are calcified. They get that way when always entirely submerged, especially in cold water like this. You know how those old fighting ships were built. Solid masses of oak, the frames set close together. They were practically as if hewn out of one enormous block of the finest seasoned wood."

The doctor shook his head, albeit his gray eyes were gleaming. "All the same, it isn't possible. For one thing she never could have turned turtle and sank right where she struck."

"She didn't," Jessica admitted. "She struck McFarlane's ledge over there about three furlongs to the northward and got dismasted. They cut away the wreck as she was settling and drifting down here with the tide. Then she sank, rolled over and made of herself the bad spot on what was afterward charted as Corvette ledge, I think the chances are that they knew at that time what it really was, but that afterward it was forgotten."

"But, Jerusalem—" the doctor's professional calm, that had grown to be his habit, was forsaking him in his excitement— "the swell would have rolled her away."

"She had to fetch up somewhere, Gardy. It's all rocky down there; she must have rolled over into a cleft, where she stuck. Her ballast shifted as she went on to her beam ends, and her guns made her top-heavy and helped hold her down. That and her ballast was dumped on to the under side of her berth deck. The swell is never heavy enough this far up into the bay to move the deeper water much."

Jessica's theory seemed preposterous, and yet her illustration of it was sound. But that the Corvette ledge should be in its danger aspect the corvette herself was not only an amazing thought but an amusing one. The doctor gave an excited chuckle.

"Well," said he, "I'm thoroughly and delightfully jiggered. I believe you are right. But whatever put it into your head? And supposing you should manage to locate her, what do you expect to find?"

Jessica's shapely head turned slowly. "Treasure," she said. "Rich treasure. Pirate loot that this old fraud of an ancestor of this young fraud of a Bob was trying to study up some scheme for appropriating. Perhaps he sank her on purpose, meaning to come back later and recover it. She may have fooled him by not sticking where she struck."

"But don't you think that your theory reconstructs too much?"

"No. I don't. I know that's a ship and not a rock. Not many girls at Papeete could beat me swimming and diving. I went down in about twenty-five feet and fetched up squarely on her keel."

"On her keel—did you say on her keel?"

"It must have been, from the way the bilges sloped off on either side. Any diver not looking for a wreck would have thought it the straight crest of a sunken reef. I went down at slack water when there was no current. Otherwise you couldn't see a thing for the algae streaming out, great layers of the elephant ear sort, with long, snaky stems. The water was clear, so that I could get an idea of her position. She's bow-and-stern in the line of the ledge, head out to the buoy and completely capsized, though heeled to the north'ard a little."

"That would make it hard to get at her guns," said the doctor.

"Oh bother her guns, Gardy. The thing to do would be to dynamite a hole to work through, then see what she has inside her."

"Something heavy must have got adrift down below to have rolled her over like that," mused Doctor White, "though of course there's no stability to speak of in a filled vessel, and the swell is sometimes pretty steep. But I can't help thinking about her guns, because each time Tom mentioned them, the count looked for a moment like a gory pirate himself."

"Perhaps she had a cargo of them in her hold," suggested Jessica. "Since she was ordered here to take and hold Pemaquid, she may have brought a supply of small cannon for its defense. That would account for her hugging bottom so hard. But even the bronze guns of those times wouldn't represent such a lot of money, would they?"

UNWISE TO PLACE TOO MUCH STRESS ON SMALL THINGS

"The great secret of successful marriage," says Harold Nicolson, "is to treat all disasters as incidents and none of the incidents as disasters."

"All disasters as incidents!"

Easier said than done, you may comment. And yet—that is not the harder part of the proposition Mr. Nicolson sets for us.

It is not the great disaster which causes the failure or unhappiness in marriage.

In the first place these are few, in a lifetime, and far between. And then the human mechanism seems to have a resiliency that comes to its rescue in great disasters. Whether real distress arouses a mutual protective instinct, touching deep down inside us—whatever the reason, it is my observation that great disasters of any nature account for a small percentage of marital shipwrecks.

But when it comes to not treating incidents as disasters! There is something that has a place in every day and almost every hour of every marriage. And it is something that has a place in the history of a large number of divorces.

For the "incidents" are a natural concomitant of every-day life. And how we respond to them gives a very good picture of the life we are leading the other one in the marital partnership. "You make nothing of anything," a querulous woman said to a friend of this writer. Needless to say that friend is happily married—and all her human contacts are similarly successful.

It is those little things in which the danger lies—those inevitable "incidents" that can so easily, but must not be allowed to, turn into disasters!

Cheese Attains Proper Rank

Home Economics Experts Appraise This Food as of Outstanding Value; Most Nutritious When Served With Vegetables or Fruit.

I wonder, says a prominent culinary expert, if you realize how much more cheese you are using in your household than used to be the custom. If you consider how many different ways you are using it in your weekly meal plan you will realize that you are using a larger amount than you once did.

Once upon a time we thought of cheese as an accompaniment for pie, as a filler for sandwiches and as an occasional accompaniment to crackers to serve after or as dessert. Now we are using it as an ingredient of many luncheon dishes, as a flavoring for soup and vegetables and even as an ingredient of bread and biscuits.

The bureau of home economics of the Department of Agriculture calls attention to the fact that cheese is one of the outstanding protein foods which, besides being economical, also brings variety and flavor to meals.

The bureau states:

"The allowance for a family of five is from five to seven pounds of lean meat, liver, fish, cheese and eggs each week, in the low cost food guide developed by the bureau. This is not a large quantity and it must be divided among the five groups and must be spread over seven days. It requires ingenuity to decide which ones to buy and how to use them in order to avoid undesirable monotony in serving inexpensive meals.

"Comparatively speaking, the foods in this group are the highest in price. Consequently, the quantity of these foods in a dietary so inexpensive is less than is normally found in the average diet. Some proteins may be supplied in cheaper forms, but meat, cheese, fish and eggs cannot be ignored. They add flavor, interest and efficient protein to a diet likely to become monotonous if made up largely of cereals and legumes."

The bureau calls attention to the fact that American cheese and cottage cheese are the two least expensive forms of cheese available in this country. The former is a commercial product made from milk and ripened, while the latter is usually home made and unripened. It has been estimated that an inch cube of American cheese has a fuel value greater than an egg and equal to an ounce of porterhouse or sirloin steak and that it supplies as much protein as the latter. The food value of cottage cheese is similar.

The popularity of macaroni and cheese is well founded, the bureau says; the flavor is pleasing and the macaroni, which is a cereal product, supplies starch and carbohydrates, which cheese lacks. But the nutrition experts of the bureau say that to balance the meal some food, such as tomatoes, lettuce, spinach or fruit, should be served with this dish and, in fact, with all cheese dishes.

"Mild flavored cheeses may be eaten in quantity, while the 'sharper' varieties are more suitable for flavoring foods which lack savor. Cottage cheese can be served in many pleasing ways other than as a salad, and the bureau has developed some interesting recipes for utilizing this inexpensive food. It may be used as a filler for sandwiches, combined with nuts, vegetables, relishes and meats. Cottage-cheese pie and old Dutch cheese cake are two old favorites. It may also be made into a loaf and baked in the oven, made into patties and into balls that are fried in deep fat."

Cheese and Bean Loaf With Tomato Sauce.

1 pound kidney beans or
1 cup dried beans, cooked until tender
1 cup grated cheese
1 small onion
1 cup soft bread crumbs
Salt
Pepper

Put the beans and onion through a meat chopper. Add the cheese and seasonings and sufficient bread crumbs to make the mixture stiff enough to be formed into a roll. Bake in a moderate oven until delicately browned, basting with hot water combined with 2 tablespoons fat. Serve hot with tomato sauce.

Dutch Cheese Cake.

8½ tablespoons flour
⅝ cup sugar
⅓ cup milk
3 eggs
1 cup cottage cheese
Lemon juice and rind
Mace or nutmeg

Mix the flour thoroughly with the sugar, slowly add the milk and cook until thickened, stirring constantly. Take from stove and stir in the cottage cheese, well-beaten eggs and flavoring. Bake in a shallow greased dish for 25 minutes in a moderate oven. This makes a very firm custard. Serve cold.

Cottage Cheese Patties.

2 tablespoons finely chopped onion
2 tablespoons fat
2 cups cottage cheese
2 cups dry bread crumbs or
1 cup cooked rice and 1 cup bread crumbs
¼ cup peanut butter
Salt
Pepper

Cook the onion in the fat until tender, but not brown. Mix with other ingredients and salt and pepper to season. Form into flat cakes and dust lightly with fine bread or cracker crumbs or cornmeal. Fry a delicate brown in a little fat in a hot frying pan. The mixture should be stiff since the cheese tends to soften during the cooking.

BIG PART PLAYED BY LIBRARIES IN TROUBLED WORLD

Foreign scholars, addressing American Library association members at their Chicago convention, asserted that libraries are essential to the "existence of a democratic society" and the "continuity of civilization." Arundell H. Esdaile, vice president of the British Library association, urging free access to books for maintaining democracy "directed by good judgment," said: "The remarkable rise of the public library in the last generation is the healthiest omen for the future, even the material future, of our troubled world that I can conceive, short of the miraculous appearance of some one who could understand, and with authority interpret, economic phenomena." Monsignor Eugene Tisserant, director of Rome's Vatican library, said that "preservation of records of scholarship means continuity of civilization in a world submitted to continuous changes."

Educational aspects of libraries was emphasized by Louis S. Shores, of Fisk university, who asserted that "ultimately college education is book education." Superior students are bored by classrooms and inferior students fail to comprehend professors' thought, said Mr. Shores. "It is the classroom as much as any other factor which has tended to a level of mediocrity of achievement for all," he said, in advocating a "library college," wherein students would find their own problems and bring them for discussion to the group room, which would be merely supplementary to the library. In this manner. Mr. Shores told delegates, "the student's rate of learning would be limited only by his own ability."—Indianapolis News.

Beauty Standards Set Forth by Great Artist

To be beautiful a woman must have seven certain qualifications. And these seven little items, listed by the classic Spanish painter Velasquez of the Sixteenth century, are: White, black, red, slender, little, broad and soft. According to Velasquez's standard, to be beautiful a woman must possess: white skin, teeth and hands; black eyes, eyebrows and eyelids; red cheeks, lips and nails; slender body, arms and legs; small teeth, ears and feet; soft hair, lips and hands; and a broad breast, forehead and root of the nose.

Perhaps it will give his "beauty standard" a little more weight if we add that Diego Rodriguez Velasquez was the head of the Spanish school of painting and was one of the greatest painters the world has ever known. He lived from 1599 to 1660. That was a long time ago, but his beauty guide still seems to hold true. Of course they didn't have platinum blondes in those days, silly!—Pathfinder Magazine.

TURKS OWE BIG DEBT TO KEMAL

Has Lifted Race to Equality Among Nations.

Turkey has been celebrating a miracle. Ten years ago Mustapha Kemal Pasha began the remaking of Turkey. Today Turkey is re-made.

Of course there is more work to be done before Kemal's vision is fully realized. It remains a fact that the change is next to incredible.

Ten years ago Turkey was essentially oriental and so backward that no one believed its modernization possible. Now Turkey is both European and modern.

Gone are the fezzes that made the Turks a people apart. Gone are the harems, gone are the veils; the Turkish women no longer deem themselves loveliest when they are fattest and laziest, but they are going strongly for trim figures and pretty clothes and jobs. Gone is the ancient idea that higher education consists in sitting on a mat and memorising the Koran. The common schools are like European schools, and the universities are occidental in their methods. Even the difficult Arabic alphabet has been abolished. Turkish, which has no affinity to Arabic, is now written with a special Turkish alphabet based on the Latin alphabet of western Europe.

Ten years ago the peasant scratched the earth with a wooden plow. There were no manufactures. There was no merchant marine. Now the Anatolian farmers use modern implements, factories have come into being, and ships flying the Turkish flag ply plentifully in Levantine waters.

The most astounding achievement is Kemal's emphatic repudiation of the almost universal dictum that the Turks are an inherently inferior race. The world has long known that the Ottoman is a first-class fighting man and a "square shooter," but under the rule of the sultans he was so deeply sunk in ignorance and so hopelessly handicapped by vicious misgovernment that he seemed incapable of intellectual betterment. Kemel's fundamental assumption was that the Turk is not inferior and that, with an equal chance, he would prove himself the equal of the races which despised him. It was an inspiration, and the subsequent leadership of Kemal has been no less than inspired.

The fact that Kemal is still a comparatively young man adds to the marvel. The fact that, unlike Mussolini and Hitler, he is nothing of a poseur, but works quietly, without ostentation, without attitudes or mummery or hullabaloo, makes Mustapha Kemal Pasha the most interesting of today's dictators. His achievements stamp him as the ablest—Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

Keep "Tab" on Heart

Declaring that germ diseases are being brought under control, but that heart troubles are increasing, Dr. Franz M. Groebel, said to be the greatest heart specialist, gave this advice during a recent visit to Los Angeles: "Don't worry nor hurry; eat regularly but not too much; smoke if you wish but use mild tobacco; drink a quart of water a day; exercise in the open air daily, and take a short nap in the middle of the day and, if possible, take two days vacation a week." During the last 25 years, heart failure has increased from 20.6 to 26.14 per 10,000 population and is now the disease aged people have most reason to fear.—Ransome Sutton, in the Los Angeles Sunday Times.

Just a Little Smile

THE DIFFICULTY

The man shook his head sadly.

"See that plot of land over there?" he said to his companion. "Last year I could have bought it for a mere song. It's now worth over twenty pounds a foot."

"I suppose you couldn't sing?" said his friend, lightly enough.

The other sniffed, "I could sing, all right, but I couldn't get the right notes."—Answers Magazine.

Exercise of a Kind

They were discussing the spoiled son of a mutual friend.

"He has been ordered by the doctor to take some exercise," said Black.

"And is he?" queried White.

"Well, if jumping at conclusions and running up bills is exercise, yes."

Ideal Company

"Why do you keep a parrot?"

"Because I like to hear it talk. The parrot is the only creature gifted with the power of speech that is content to repeat just what it hears without trying to make a long story of it."—Montreal Star.

'NUF SAID

"My wife's out of town."

"I know two other good fellows."

Eating, Anyway

Oshkosh—What makes you think Kokomo is prospering now?

Tishtish—Well, I saw gravy stains on his vest.

GOOD IDEA

The club bore had just returned from a trip to India, and insisted upon describing the rope trick.

"You can believe what you like," he asserted, "but I tell you some of these fakirs can throw a rope up into the air, then climb up it themselves and completely vanish."

After a short silence one fellow said, "Can you, by any chance, do that trick yourself?"—Tit-Bits Magazine.

Joke of the Season

"Why, George! What are you laughing at?"

"Oh, I've just heard the best joke of the year."

"What is it?"

"Didn't you know that our maid has got a job in a china shop?"

EVEN SO!

"The rain falls alike on the just and the unjust."

"True, but the unjust man is generally provided with the just man's umbrella."

Man of Experience

"That's the second time today I've seen that man following that woman in another car, yelling at her all the time."

"Yes, that's old Johnson. He's teaching his wife to drive, but he's not taking any risks himself!"

Foxy Youth

Mother—Who's the brightest boy in your class, Tommy?

Tommy—Bill Smith! He pretends to be loony so he won't have to study!

Hojack—What do you do with your dull old razor blades?

Skookum—Shave with them.

THE GREATEST AMERICAN

Who was the greatest American? Washington was known for his honesty. He is the American symbol for truth.

Lincoln is always thought of in connection with justice and sympathy. Franklin D. Roosevelt dares to go ahead in spite of many obstacles.

They were all great men, it is true, but what about the men and women who toil on without ever coming into the eye of the public? Quietly they go about their work of helping to feed and cl the a busy country. Are they not great also?

What of the pioneers? They opened a new country and made it safe for the coming generations. They fought the Indians and braved hunger, cold, thirst, and death to establish homes.

Are not all Americans great who obey the laws of their country, bring up their children to be the sort of citizens America can be proud of, and are ready to answer their country's call in time of war or in time of peace?

Who can then truly say which one is the greatest?

Banks Receive New Rules Under New Guaranty Law

All banks that are members of the Federal Reserve System including State Banks, that are members of the system or who will come under the Bank Insurance Guarantee law, that goes into effect on January 1st, 1934, have received the following orders:

Certificates of Deposit cannot be paid before they are due even though the interest is waived.

Certificates made for 6 or 12 months if not presented for payment at the end of 6 months (exact maturity date) must run for the full 12 months.

Interest on C. D.'s issued now must not exceed 3 per cent annually.

No interest can be paid after maturity.

C. D.'s cannot be dated back nor may the interest date be dated back. Example: A certificate 30 days overdue may be paid as to principal and interest but the interest must be for the exact time of the C. D.—one year or six months, as the case may be. The certificate may be renewed on the day presented but not dated back, nor may the interest date be dated back.

After October 31, 1933 interest on Savings Accounts could not exceed 3 per cent compounded semi-annually.

Interest may be compounded on shorter than semi-annual period but in such case the rate must be low enough so that the interest thus computed does not exceed the yield at 3 per cent compounded semi-annually.

Surplus Buffalo at Park To Be Butchered, Report

From Cody, Wyoming comes a report that snow and cold weather, which have been delayed this year, will sound the death knell for 235 head of buffalo in the Yellowstone National Park, according to Joseph Joffe, assistant to the superintendent of the park.

The buffalo slated to be killed represent the surplus of the largest buffalo herd in the United States, Mr. Joffe said.

The government has decreed that the Yellowstone heard must be reduced this year to 900 animals. Curtailment of the herd is necessitated because of poor range conditions and the cost of feed.

The killing will be done by government park rangers, while the butchering will be done by a crew of hired butchers.

U.S. Uses Plane, Snow-Shoes, Dogs, To Serve North Citizen

Baudette.—Uncle Sam needed an airplane, a pair of snow shoes and a team of dogs to get there, but obstacles did not count when it came to rendering service to his citizen who lives on the top peak of Continental United States. Martin Hanson, who claims the distinction of being the resident furtherest north of the country proper; made application to the government for a loan under the Home Owners Loan corporation, and Carlos F. Wheaton, representative of the corporation, made a trip north to appraise the homestead. From Baudette Wheaton took a sixty-mile trip by plane across Lake of the Woods into the wilds. There he traveled by dog team for several miles and made the balance of the trip on sno-shoes.

A few parties have told us that as far as they could see there was not much gain in going out of town to do their Christmas shopping. We have preached this to you for years.

But, its like the man said, "It pays to Advertise."

National Prohibition Passes Out and Foreign Liquor Comes In—Monetary Problems Still Disquieting—Will Budget Director Douglas Resign?

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

Joseph H. Choate, Jr.

NATIONAL prohibition went into the discard on December 5. State conventions in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Utah ratified the repeal amendment on that day, making the necessary thirty-six, and immediately on being notified by telegraph, President Roosevelt and Acting Secretary of State William Phillips issued proclamations that the Eighteenth amendment was no longer a part of the Constitution. In twenty-four of the forty-eight states the manufacture and sale of liquor now is or soon will be legal. The state laws under which it can be sold vary from those providing "wide open" saloons in Nevada to a strict system of dispensing hard liquor in Montana only through state-owned stores, one in every county. Most widely enacted of the laws is one providing for serving of hard liquor only with meals.

Governmental agencies in Washington were swamped with preparatory measures to deal with the importation of foreign liquors, many huge cargoes of which were waiting for entry; and with the federal restrictions necessary to protect the states that remain dry. Joseph H. Choate, Jr., of New York, son of the famous lawyer and statesman, had been appointed director of the federal alcohol control administration, and he arrived in the capital to take up his duties. Mr. Choate halted the issuance of import permits until a few hours before repeal became an accomplished fact, and in the meantime officials checked the financial standing of importers and worked out quotas for foreign countries.

It was understood that between four and five million gallons of foreign spirits and wines would be allowed entry during December and January, and that, if the demand were greater than the supply, the quantity might be increased in order to discourage bootlegging. The government sought to prevent a flood of foreign liquor from swamping the American market to the detriment of domestic producers. More than 1,200 importers asked permits to bring in 12,000,000 gallons. Dr. J. M. Doran, industrial alcohol commissioner, estimated consumption the first month after repeal would be 10,000,000 gallons.

Codes for the distillers and importers already were in effect, and those for the brewers, the rectifiers and blenders and the wine growers were being completed. When congress meets in January one of the first matters to be taken up will be legislation to increase the taxes on liquor and for permanent control of the traffic. To draw up such legislation the house ways and means committee and the senate finance committee were called to meet in joint sessions beginning December 11.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT returned from his two weeks in Warm Springs and plunged at once into the work of solving the various financial problems confronting his administration. Most immediate of these was the refinancing of government obligations amounting to about $727,000,000 maturing the middle of the month. The treasury planned to borrow perhaps a billion dollars, and it was felt that the response of lenders and the terms offered would supply a test of the government's credit.

There was no cessation of the controversy over the President's monetary policy and the arguments on both sides grew more bitter, though Mr. Roosevelt himself maintained silence. Financial interests have been considerably annoyed by the fact that the severe federal securities act has checked the movement of capital into legitimate channels, and they were cheered up by Senator Fletcher's statement that President Roosevelt wants the act amended to correct this fault without diminishing the protection of the investing public. Mr. Fletcher, who is chairman of the senate banking committee, said Mr. Roosevelt's attitude had been brought to him by Acting Secretary Morgenthau of the treasury. In this connection he said the President had not asked the banking committee to recommend legislation to curtail the stock exchange operations, although the chairman said he believed the committee members agreed with him that some kind of government supervision, perhaps in the form of control of margin accounts, was desirable. He said the committee did not desire to cripple the securities exchanges.

The senator said he believed some sort of regulatory legislation would be passed by congress "to put restrictions on gambling." He said he did not know whether the commodity markets would be included, but said "it is possible we may have to extend the supervision to those."

The federal trade commission reports that failure of issuers to furnish information required under the securities act has kept about $22,000,000 of stocks and bonds off the market.

COMPTROLLER General McCarl settled that controversy over the purchase of Ford trucks for the civilian conservation corps, and the Northwest Motor company of Bethesda, Md., the Ford dealer, won out. The question at stake was whether a distributor with the right to display the blue eagle should be denied the right to bid on government contracts because goods he handled were manufactured by a firm not adhering to the NRA or a code.

Decision to accept the low bid of Northwest Motor company was announced "with the concurrence of the secretary of agriculture and the national recovery administrator," it was given out. The decision was reached, it was explained, "in the advice of the comptroller general, as the best way to secure compliance with the President's re-employment program."

SECRETARY of the Interior Ickes, disputing Alfred E. Smith's charge that the administration's public works program had failed, gave out a statement showing that 2,903,360 men were working under allotments made to date from the $3,300,000,000 public works fund, including those put to work under the new civil works administration.

"The facts speak for themselves," Mr. Ickes said in presenting the figures—the first he has issued showing the actual number of men employed on public works projects. "Nobody can intelligently appraise the public works program without studying these figures."

Mr. Ickes qualified the "actual count" by which he claimed to have ascertained the extent of public works employment by explaining that for every man found to be at work on a project two men were figured to have been employed indirectly in furnishing materials. The ratio of 2 to 1, he stated, is "universally accepted as conservative for the type of work undertaken."

Lewis Douglas

HOW long Budget Director Lewis Douglas will continue to hold his job is a question that interests observers in Washington. He has worried over the expansion of emergency obligations of the government and has warned against any further increase, but almost certainly his warning will not be heeded when congress meets.

Mr. Douglas thinks that the entire budget, including both general and emergency funds, may be brought into balance toward the end of the fiscal year 1935 if no further emergency funds are authorized after the $3,300,000,000 public works fund and the less than a billion left in the RFC fund are used up. He thinks these funds should be sufficient for emergency purposes.

Others in the administration, including the President, have different ideas. Secretary of the Interior Ickes expects to ask for an increase of as much as $1,700,000,000 in the public works fund. The RFC probably will want $1,000,000,000 or more. The new civil works administration will run out of money in the middle of the winter and the President already has expressed the hope that additional funds will be forthcoming from congress. Its allotments have come thus far from both the public works funds and the relief fund of the RFC.

DEATH came suddenly to Alexander Legge, president of the International Harvester company and one of the country's leading industrialists, in his suburban home near Chicago. He was almost sixty-eight years of age and apparently had been in good health.

Mr. Legge was the first chairman of the federal farm board, under President Hoover, giving up his $100,000 post with the Harvester company in the summer of 1929 to accept the $12,000-a-year government position. For 20 months he devoted himself to farm relief experiments, standing his ground in the face of widespread criticism. Then he resigned and returned to his former place. In war days he was vice chairman of the war industries board. He was one of President Wilson's economic experts at the Versailles peace conference.

OBERLIN college at Oberlin, Ohio, celebrated its one hundredth anniversary with a great gathering of alumni, students, faculty and distinguished visitors. The college is especially proud of the fact that it was the first institution of higher learning in America to establish coeducation; the first to take a definite stand against slavery; the first to introduce physical education courses, and among the first to adopt the "ranking system" of grading.

FOREIGN COMMISSAR MAXIM LITVINOV of Russia, on his way home from his triumphant visit in Washington, stopped over in Rome for a conference with Premier Mussolini, and the correspondents said this resulted in an agreement for Soviet-Fascist collaboration to better the situation in Europe. The well informed thought Mussolini had obtained the support of Russia in his efforts to solve the disarmament problem and that he and Litvinov were in accord in the matter of having Russia and the United States asked to join in the four-power pact. Before Litvinov left Rome he was given a brilliant banquet by the Duce, which was attended by numerous dignitaries.

E. E. Buero

WITH considerable ceremony and military display the seventh Pan-American conference was opened in Montevideo, Uruguay, to continue probably three weeks. Its deliberations are managed by Enrique E. Buero as secretary-general. He is one of Uruguay's most prominent young diplomats and was summoned from his post as minister to Germany to this duty in the conference.

In his speech inaugurating the sessions President Gabriel Terra of Uruguay demanded the "scaling down in all American countries of customs tariffs which President Roosevelt justly termed unsound, fatal and direct originators of world economic disaster." He referred to Mr. Roosevelt's indictment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff measure and retaliatory acts "to which other nations were forced."

Concerning the war in the Gran Chaco between Bolivia and Paraguay, he said, "The noble American juridical tradition cannot remain buried in the swamps of the Chaco."

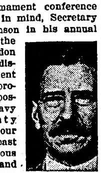
Postponed from 1932 because of the depression, a gathering in which all 21 nations of the western hemisphere were participating found uppermost in the minds of delegates a mutual search for co-operative methods to improve the economic status of their countries.

Secretary of State Hull heads the delegation from United States, and nine other foreign ministers are participating in the conference.

PHYSICISTS of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology are now ready to proceed with their attempt to smash the atom, for the huge generator designed by Dr. R. J. Van De Graff successfully passed its test at Round Hill, Mass.

A 7,000,000 volt direct current bolt of man-made lightning split and crackled from the two giant aluminum cylinders which act as terminals of the generator and flashed between each other and to the roof and walls of the converted hangar which houses it on the estate of Col. E. H. R. Green.

This first test, witnessed by a handful of distinguished scientists and the anxious designers and makers of the generator, more than fulfilled the hopes of physicists who believe that when it is in operation to its full capacity of 10,000,000 volts it will tear the veil from the innermost secrets of nature.



Secretary Swanson

WITH his experience as a delegate to the disarmament conference at Geneva clearly in mind, Secretary of the Navy Swanson in his annual report urges that the United States abandon leadership in the disarmament movement "by example" and proceed as soon as possible to build its navy up to full treaty strength. He says our concessions in the past have been "dangerous extravagance" and that peace is jeopardized by our weakened condition "because balanced armaments fortify diplomacy."

The report showed Japan will have its full treaty strength of 183 vessels with a total tonnage of 775,370 when the treaty expires December 31, 1936, whereas the United States will have only 113 under-age vessels with a total tonnage of 988,520. Under the treaty, the report said, the United States could construct ninety-six more ships with 157,280 tons displacement.

The British empire, according to the secretary, will have 161 vessels with 999,398 tons displacement at the same date, permitting it to build sixty-four ships with a displacement of 197,607 tons.

Secretary Swanson's recommendations include these:

Building of the United States fleet in "orderly, progressive steps" to full London naval treaty strength by December 31, 1936.

Congressional authorization of more aircraft, within the present 1,000-plane limit, to equip fighting ships built since 1926.

Full restoration of the 15 per cent general cut and "frozen" promotion emoluments in the navy.

Japan was highly displeased by Secretary Swanson's approval of the present treaty ratios for navies. The spokesman for the naval office in Tokio declared that Japan is thoroughly dissatisfied with her present allotments under the 5-5-3 ratio and is determined to demand an upward revision of Japan's quota when the naval powers reconvene to consider extension of the Washington and London treaties.

Only a few days before the Japanese cabinet had approved the navy's replenishment program calling for about $245,000,000 for the next three years.

The Guns of the Holy Trinity

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette. Two Frenchmen, the comte De Corlay and his son Robert, claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A French sailor, Sebastien, also knows of the treasure, and is seeking it. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, which is not where it had been supposed.

"Nothing to account for the gleam of cupidity I caught in the count's face at each mention of the guns. Just for a second it changed the look of him from that of a mild-mannered gentleman and scholar to a Sir Henry Morgan, peering from the jungle at Panama."

Jessica pursed her red lips, a mannerism of thought with her, as another may frown or thrust out the jaw. "Guns are hollow, Gardy."

"Even a small one," observed the doctor, "would hold a good many Isabella doubloons, or a very great treasure of precious gems."

Jessica moved restlessly. "You are rousing my avarice, Gardy."

"That's the trouble with treasure," Doctor White admitted. "I'm beginning to feel myself rather like the old gentleman looked."

"His son didn't look that way. His reactions are better controlled. I should say that temperamentally he is an exceedingly well-disciplined young man, a natural born liar."

"Well, perhaps," agreed the doctor. "But you can't blame them much. It must have been a jolt to find Tom already on the field, and to learn from him that this Sebastien was trying to beat them to it."

Jessica smiled. "That's a mosquito bite to the jolt they're in for now. We must get going, Gardy."

The clangor of a ship's bell sharply struck came ringing through the woods. It was the bell of Captain Poole's four-masted schooner, retained by Jessica as a souvenir when the vessel was sold, and now mounted on an oak at the corner of the house. The pair sprang up guiltily from the flat rock on which they had been perched. "I'll catch it," said Jessica. "I forgot about supper."

"If it weren't over ten feet I'd have a look down myself tomorrow morning," said the doctor, "but it might as well be twenty-five hundred as twenty-five, for me."

"You keep out of it," said Jessica. "I'm going to have another look, though. If I can get a line fast to some part of her, that will establish legal claims."

"I'd rather you shouldn't try, my dear."

"It can't hurt me. It will be slack water at four in the morning. You can come along and help. Weight down the line and keep the boat over me. Then you can go over to East Boothbay and get a car and tear out for Bath."

CHAPTER IV

Reminding his father, after supper, that he was going with Tom to search out Sebastien, Robert went down to the landing, where he found his Yankee ally sitting in the stern of a large open launch, smoking a cigar.

"Hello, Tom," Robert greeted him. "All ready?"

"Yep. Hop aboard and we'll go," Tom answered cheerfully, albeit with a glint of remembered anger beneath the smile in his eyes. "Fine night for a murder, Bob."

"Gad, I hope you don't mean to scrag the beggars, Tom," Robert said, considerably startled.

"I'd like to stop just short of that!" With which rather grim speech he cranked the motor, a new four-cycle installation that was quiet and could drive the heavy boat about twelve miles an hour.

"What's the penalty for sinking a boat like this one of Sebastien's?" Robert asked. "Not that I care a hang, but just out of curiosity."

"None—if you don't get caught. None anyhow, if she happens to be a bootlegger, or down this way if she's a Bluenose—a 'Scotiaman.'"

Robert chuckled again. "My word, but you're a cool hand, Tom. I'd almost believe you had a personal hate on the fellow."

Tom's reply to this was a noncommittal, "H'm." He had no intention of speaking to the young Frenchman of Jessica's narrow escape from Sebastien. That he felt to be his personal quarrel.

"The blighter's a bad egg, Tom," observed Robert, after a moment.

"Well, you can scramble a bad egg, if you can stand the smell. Some of these very laws of ours can be used to serve the ends of pirates. I learned tonight that this yawl-rigged cruiser we're going to give the up-and-down is a Nova Scotia vessel that came in here leaking badly; and that they've put her on the beach to caulk and piece her planking around the rudder post. They said her motor quit on her running round from Sable island to Digby in that hard nor'easter about a week ago, and as their sails were rotten they ran for it, not being sure about their position until they picked up Monhegan. That all might be."

"I told you he was an artful beggar, Tom."

"You told the truth, if that's the bird. There's no flaw to be found in the story, because this is about where he would fetch up running off before a nor'easter, and his first act was to go on the crib and rip the old caulking out of his seams and cut away the planking under the counter. As they are not hauled out and just afloat at high water they can work for only a couple of hours a day. The rest of the time they can go pirooting round hunting for the corvette. They can't be fired out with their tub wide open, and she can't be sent to bottom as long as she's already there."

Robert nodded. "He's a downy bird, Sebastien. No ordinary guillemot. To be on the safe side, papa and I talked English that day. But I learned later that Sebastien speaks it as well as I do." He was silent for a moment, then said slowly, "Look here, Tom, all this alters our relations a good bit. I think I'd better tell you that papa and I know just about where that wreck lies—and so must Sebastien."

"The deuce you do," said Tom, considerably startled.

"Yes, her position was exactly marked in the old boy's diary, and we've verified it."

Tom drew a deep breath. Here was an armor-piercing shell. Tom could see his immediate hopes and ambitions mounting to the zenith on the top of a detonated charge of trinitrololuol. He squared his jaw and shoulders, then gave Robert a steady look. A good deal depended on the answer to the question he next asked.

"Just why are you telling me this, Bob?"

"Because it's no more than fair, my dear Tom. In all honor I can't let you go ahead and risk getting yourself into a pack of trouble only to bilk you of your share of the proceeds. That would not be according to the traditions of my service."

"Vive la France," Tom said, "and likewise, noblesse oblige. I understand that thing a little better, now."

"Well then, Tom, I've learned a lot more about Yankee nerve and resource and your curious slant on things. Can't we come to an agreement about this business?"

"Unless there's some error, which I can't see, I should say you held all the trumps, Bob."

"There is no error at all, Tom. I've thumped a dipsey lead on the bottom of the old bark."

"On the bottom?"

"Right. She's lying bottom up. But we haven't all the trumps, because Sebastien holds a few."

"Then why hasn't he gone to it, Bob?"

"I think that boat of his did really open up, and he thought he'd better get her tight before he had his go. He mayn't have thought there was such a devilish rush. But there is, you see."

"Have you got her buoyed?" Tom asked.

"No need. You can almost see her old carapace at ebb tide. I doubt you ever could guess where she is, Tom. But before we go any further, you might tell me what you feel your claim amounts to."

"What I said this afternoon can stand, Bob. All I ever counted on was her guns; but if she's bottom up, like you say, it would be some job to get them out from under her. Scarcely pay the shot, or shots, because we'd have to dynamite her, and she's probably petrified by now."

"Then why not fix on a money compensation, Tom? That, of course, provided that we can give friend Sebastien the slip some way."

Tom pondered this a little. They were by this time off Pemaquid point, beginning to round that formidable bastion of the coast that can be so fearful to the inshore pilot under thick and stormy conditions of weather. Even now, still as it was, a great ground swell was humping up disturbedly as its long skirts caught and were impeded by the shoaling bottom.

"That would depend a good deal on the prospective amount, Bob," Tom said presently. "You see, I haven't the least idea how much you expect to haul down—or rather up. But it seems to me that if I were to stave off Sebastien I'd be entitled to a third—after all costs were deducted, even to your expense in coming out here, of course."

"Well, I think so, too," said Robert. "I don't believe Sebastien has the least idea we're on the ground, because he would naturally expect us to come here in some such boat as his and get directly at work. There would seem to be no reason for our doing otherwise, since we've known from the start precisely where to find, or at least to look for the old hooker."

"Well, then, why the deuce didn't you?"

Stefansson Tells of Conditions in Arctic

Vilhjalmur Stefansson is a great Arctic explorer, but an exceedingly modest one. He always disclaims being a hero or having undergone any extraordinary hardships in the Arctic regions, says the Scientific American.

Mr. Stefansson is definitely of the opinion that with proper precautions and preparations life in the Arctic may be relatively pleasant, and flying within the Arctic circle perfectly possible.

At a lecture which the explorer delivered before the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, Mr. Stefansson took pains to explode certain erroneous ideas which have apparently been handed down to us from the ancient Greeks. The notion is prevalent that for at least half the year the Arctic regions are in darkness. As a matter of fact, for two-thirds of the year the sun never sets at the North pole, and it is only during one-third of the year that there is night. What is more, snow and ice are such perfect reflectors of light, that there is never, at the North pole, the absolute darkness which may prevail at the equator.

Another popular fallacy is that the maximum of extreme cold is found at the North pole; the maximum degree of cold has actually been found and recorded in the province of Yakutsk in Siberia (1,100 miles from the North pole), where a temperature of 93 degrees below zero, Fahrenheit, has been found.

Grafton.—John Volek, a 71-year-old patriarch from Pisek for 36 years lived in Walsh county, but not once had touched the streets of Grafton. He has been a taxpayer for 20 years and just recently came to Grafton to register for employment under the C. W. A.

Hannah.—Ralph Nickerson while hunting rabbits came upon an animal crouched on the snow about 25 or 30 feet away. Raising his .22 he shot, striking the animal between the eyes and he shot again, hitting it behind the ear, by this time the animal was still. The animal was a Canadian lynx and was 50 inches long.

Bismarck.—Mary Cayon, graduate of the University of North Dakota, has accepted a position as hostess at the Wigwam guest ranch at Litchfield Park, Ariz. The ranch, accommodating 70 guests, is operated by the Goodyear Tire and Rubber company.

Dickinson.—Between 75 and 100 men will be given employment with the reopening of the Lehigh Briquetting company at Lehigh, near here. New equipment, including coal cars manufactured in Fargo, has been installed under direction of Edward Prostel, manager.

Amidon.—Seriously injured when mauled by a tame coyote belonging to T. M. Eide of Buffalo Springs, Duane Friese, 3, is recovering in a Bowman hospital. The coyote attacked the boy as the child sought to pet him. The animal inflicted severe head wounds on the child.

Rolla.—Mrs. Harry Williams, 83, who served as an attendant in the royal household of Queen Victoria of Great Britain until she came to this country 40 years ago, died at her home here. Mrs. Williams entered the royal household when a child. Her husband survives her.

Lidgerwood.—Grant Thorson, Lidgerwood, 28, and single, had his eye injured to the extent of having to have it removed as a result of the cleaning of a shotgun with a jackknife. The gun discharged and sent a portion of the knife blade into the eyeball.

Fargo.—The North Dakota State College Bison started their basketball season against the Dickinson Teachers by winning 46-22; their second game was with Jamestown college and they were defeated 35-34. The Bison will play their first home game with the Nebraska university on December 29.

The truck was utterly demolished.

Mandan.—The registered Holstein herd owned by the Northern Great Plains Dairy station at Mandan, has received special recognition in a report issued by the Holstein-Friesian Association of America. "Only two herds of Holsteins in the United States have four heifers with a better average than the four best ones in the Mandan herd." This report was given by the superintendent of the association.

Even though he still possesses a good portion of the speed and skill that made him famous, Mandell is considered little better than an even chance of defeating Kennard. Victory over Mandell would raise him into the title-challenging ranks.

Beulah.—Grasshopper poisoning, abandoned in fields of Fred Sinerius and Mike Giese, Beulah farmers, claimed the lives of 10 head of cattle after the animals ate the poisoned mash.

Stanley.—Believed to be the first felony prosecution in the state this year arising out of the death in an automobile accident, although over 100 people have been killed, Amos Hendricks of Plaza was convicted on charge of second degree manslaughter. His sentence was 1½ years in the penitentiary.

Fruit Cake of High Quality

Many Ways of Making It, but All Have One Common Foundation—Liberality in Fruit for the Mixture Is Indispensable.

The other day, says a writer on home economics, some one asked me to define different types of fruit cakes according to their native origin. I quite blithely answered, "Why, certainly! English fruit cake is usually dark and southern fruit cake is usually light!" Then, upon looking up recipes in numerous books in my collection, I discovered that I had been too quick in my response. I was answering out of my experience in English and southern homes. I find that the cook books do not agree with my own experiences and so I think I shall have to designate my fruit cake recipes in some other way, perhaps by their color.

While fruit cake recipes vary, they are all alike in one respect—they must contain plenty of fruit. The mixture which holds them together may be flavored in a variety of ways, and these flavorings are not only responsible for the variation in taste but also for the variation in color. The fruit content varies from the simplest type, which contains only raisins, to the most elaborate, which may have citron, apricots, pineapple, figs, currants, dates, or cherries, candied fruit peels, and almonds or pecans in addition. Old fruit cake recipes call for brandy or sherry to furnish the liquid. In the absence of these you will find fruit juices, cider, jelly, and coffee useful.

No matter what type of cake you decide to make, you must give it a long baking or combined steaming and baking. Some people find that the easiest way to bake a fruit cake is to steam it first! It will take about two and a half to three hours steaming and then it may be finished by taking an hour longer in a slow oven, to dry it out. A reader asks me to mention the type of utensils used when cakes and puddings are steamed. A regular "steamer" is, of course, easiest. Anything put in this type of steamer must be tightly covered with tin or oiled or parchment paper, or cellophane, held tightly in place by a rubber band or a string. If you haven't a steamer, you can easily manufacture one by using a large kettle and placing your puddings or cakes on a trivet or rack. You will have to renew the water more often in this makeshift arrangement, but it will be perfectly satisfactory.

Naturally the length of time for baking depends upon the size of the cake. Very small cakes will bake in an hour and a quarter, while the large cakes take as much as three hours. To prevent its browning too quickly, it is sometimes covered with paper, or if you are using a glass baking dish you may use the cover which comes with it. After the mixture is in the pans you may decorate the top with candied cherries and almonds in artistic arrangement.

I wonder if you have seen the ready-to-mix and bake fruit cake mixtures which have come on the market? Fruits and nuts of excellent quality cut in large pieces, as they should be for good and true fruit cakes, are combined with the dry ingredients ready for you to add the liquid. One of these products comes in a pan which is lined with paper into which the cake mixture may be put back and baked. This pan may also be used with its cover for storing the cake. You will also find excellent ready baked fruit cakes in fancy boxes suitable for Christmas gifts.

One of my friends, an expert, who is the owner and manager of a well-known restaurant, told me a very interesting thing about keeping fruit cakes. After the cakes are baked and put away for storage she covers them with a layer of brown sugar, which keeps them moist and develops the flavors. I am passing this very valuable hint on to you. And don't forget that the sooner you make your cakes the better they will be at Christmas time!

Dark Fruit Cake

1 pound citron.
1 pound candied apricots.
1 pound candied pineapple.
1 pound candied cherries.
2 pounds seeded raisins.
1 pound currants.
½ pound raw almonds.
½ pound flour.
1 teaspoon baking powder.
1 teaspoon cinnamon.
¼ teaspoon cloves.
1 teaspoon nutmeg.
½ pound butter.
½ pound brown sugar.
6 eggs.
1½ cups cider.
1 glass jelly.
Yield—10 pounds.

Cut into thin slices the citron, pineapple and apricots. Cut the cherries. Wash the raisins and currants and dry them. Blanch and chop the almonds. Mix these ingredients together. Sift flour with baking powder and spices. Combine fruit and flour mixtures thoroughly. Cream the butter and sugar. Add the egg yolks and then the cider and jelly alternately with the fruit mixture. Beat the egg whites until stiff and fold them into the fruit mixture. Grease the bottoms and sides of glass baking dishes and fill about three-fourths full. Decorate tops of cake with candied cherries and almonds. Cover and bake in a slow oven, 275 degrees Fahrenheit, 1¼ to 3 hours. The length of baking time will depend on the size of the baking dishes.

White Fruit Cake

1 cup seeded white raisins.
½ cup sliced orange peel.
½ cup sliced lemon peel.
½ cup sliced citron.
1 package shredded coconut.
1 cup blanched almonds.
2¼ cups flour.
1 teaspoon baking powder.
¼ teaspoon salt.
½ cup shortening.
1 cup sugar.
3 eggs.
¼ cup sherry flavoring.
½ cup orange juice.

Wash raisins and drain well. Place raisins, fruit peels, coconut and coarsely chopped nut meats in bowl. Sift flour, baking powder and salt over fruit; mix fruit through the flour with fingers. Cream shortening, add sugar gradually, then beaten eggs. Add flavoring. Stir in fruits and flour mixture alternately with orange juice. Pour mixture into one large or several small greased tins. Bake in a slow oven, 300 degrees Fahrenheit. Makes three pounds.

Honey Fruit Cake

2 pounds raisins.
1 pound currants.
½ pound citron.
¼ pound candied orange peel.
¼ pound candied cherries.
½ pound dates.
½ pound figs.
½ pound blanched almonds.
½ pound flour.
½ pound shortening.
½ pound sugar.
6 eggs (well beaten).
1 cup sour milk.
1 cup honey.
½ cup currant jelly.
1½ teaspoons salt.
2 teaspoons nutmeg.
2 teaspoons cinnamon.
¼ teaspoon cloves.
1 teaspoon allspice.
¾ teaspoon soda.
1 teaspoon baking powder.

Chop fruit and nuts and dredge with one-half cup flour. Cream shortening and sugar until light and add the eggs, sour milk, honey, jelly. Mix thoroughly. Sift the remainder of the flour with the salt, spices, soda and baking powder and sift into the egg mixture. Beat until smooth and stir in the dredged fruit and nuts. Pour into well-greased baking dishes. Bake at 275 degrees Fahrenheit for 2½ hours. One-half hour before the cakes are done remove from the oven, brush over with honey and decorate as desired. Return to the oven to finish baking. Cool and then place covers on baking dishes, and if allowed to ripen three weeks or longer the cakes will be better. Makes nine pounds.

Variations in Colors of Locusts Explained

Mexican dispatches reporting that harmless green locusts not unlike ordinary American grasshoppers are turning red and communistic and are attacking vested institutions in the form of farmers' crops describe something neither so unique nor so mysterious as Mexican entomologists appear to believe. There can be no doubt that what is happening is merely another instance of the change of one form or "phase" of locust into another, as elucidated during the last few years by studies of African locusts by Dr. B. P. Uvarov of the British Imperial Institute of Entomology; by Prof. J. C. Faure of the University of South Africa, and others. In Africa, as elsewhere, the solitary locust usually is green or greenish yellow. The migratory locust, billions of which form the flying swarms sometimes even obscuring the sun, is red-brown or black. Once the two were deemed separate species. Now they are known to be two forms of the same one.

LARGE HEAD NOT SURE INDICATION OF BRAIN POWER

Is the size of our heads an index to our intelligence?

A Washington scientist has asked British members of parliament to let him have particulars of the length, breadth, and circumference of their heads. While at the moment he won't commit himself too far, he says that the brains of 100 eminent persons have been examined, and in the majority of cases the weight is above the average. And the size of the head is a guide to the size of the brain.

But it may be dangerous to form any too definite conclusions. The fact that epileptics usually have relatively large brains must, for instance, be taken into account. What is probably the largest brain ever measured belonged to an epileptoid idiot.

Then, taking the six next biggest brains on record, we get a very curious mixture. One of them belonged to Turgeniev, the Russian novelist, and another to Cuvier, the great zoologist. But three belonged to quite undistinguished individuals, and the sixth was an imbecile's.

Of the six largest women's brains—all smaller than any of those mentioned above—two belonged to lunatics, and a third to a medical student who committed suicide because she was afraid she had failed in her final examination. None of the others belonged to a person of eminence.

Other "guides to intelligence" are not much more helpful than size of head. One American scientist, as a result of investigations, came to the conclusion that the heaviest and tallest children were the most intelligent, but two other investigators, working in Iowa and Florence, arrived at a precisely opposite result.

In London elementary schools, it was found that stupid children tended to be below the average height, and clever children above it.—London Answers.

FIND THE TREND AND FOUNDATION OF CHILD FEARS

Despite the definite trend toward realism in modern life, children still are afraid of such supernatural manifestations as giants, witches, monsters, ghosts and devils. Mystery and gorilla movies, spooky stories, radio crime programs, and even lurid pictures in newspapers produce distinct fears, while kidnaping retains—even before the sensational kidnaping wave of the past two years—a large element of dreaded fear for many children.

These findings are among the many derived from an exhaustive study of children's fears, desires and fancies just completed by Dr. Arthur T. Jersild, assistant professor of education and research of the Child Labor Development institute, Teachers' college, Columbia university. Doctor Jersild studied 400 children, ages five to twelve, in public and private schools of New York. He delved into their dreams, asked them what they would do if they had a million dollars, and whether they preferred to be boys or girls.

One of the most surprising findings was the fears of the occult, the supernatural, of mystery, skeletons, corpses and deaths. Twenty-one per cent of the children classed these as their "worst fears." The younger children expressed fear of animals, while seven per cent were primarily afraid of robbers, kidnapers and others of the criminal class. Doctor Jersild said the fear of kidnaping had been engendered by conversation and stories, often by parents, for all but twelve of the 400 children had been interviewed before the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby, early in 1932.—Literary Digest.

This Wonderful World

We know a man who moved away from a big city to a small town so he could have some peace and leisure. Now he has moved back to the city again.

He told us that the little towns and the big towns are all alike. Something going on all the time in both places—dinners, parties, suppers, entertainments, clubs, everybody everywhere on the jump, nobody hardly ever at home, men worn out and women tired to death.

But, maybe this man we are talking about is nothing but an old crab. An old cynic who can't see that the world is so full of such wonderful things we should all be as happy as kings.—John Steven McGroarty, in the Los Angeles Sunday Times.

TREAT FOR THE WIFE

The hour of midnight was just striking as the householder crept silently down the stairs. With a quick movement he snapped on the electric light and gasped as his eyes fell on a burglar tampering with his safe.

"Jove, a real burglar!" he smiled. "Wait a minute, will you?"

The burglar prepared to make his escape.

"While you call a copper, eh?" he said. "Not me!"

"No," said the householder. "Only wait while I call my wife. She's heard you every night for 15 years, and it'll be a real pleasure to her to see you at last."

"Why, what's the matter?" asked the head waitress. "Butter bad again?"

"No," said the manager; "the beef's tough."—London Tit-Bits.

The Safety Man

Christmas crowds — shoppers burdened down with parcels— town intersections jammed with pedestrians — busses crammed with people and packages—delivery trucks loaded to capacity with drivers trying hard to maintain heavy schedules — slippery streets, chilling winds, snow, sleet, and ice.

With all this must a man contend who earns his livelihood driving a heavy commercial vehicle thru crowded streets.

Give him a break—help him along. Do not cross against traffic lights. The pedestrian can help considerably to make safer conditions especially around the busy Christmas season.

Many accidents are caused by the overloading or careless loading of trucks. Overloading may cause failure of a wheel or axle, falling of the load, and possible injuries to some workman. In loading trucks, the material should be evenly distributed to avoid the possibility of load shifting and tipping over.

Frequent periodical inspection of trucks and equipment should be made to see whether the wheels are sound and well secured and the axles, state-sockets, and other fittings in good condition.

It pays to keep your truck and automobile in the best physical condition. Then you will always be prepared in an emergency.

No More Beer For Mahnomen

J. O. Lay, of the Cheyenne Agency, S. D., an officers of the Interior Department, came to Mahnomen recently according to the Mahnomen Pioneer, and ordered all holders of beer licenses to stop the sale of beer in that territory. Consternation reigned in certain localities. A few days time were given to dispose of stocks on hand, provided that no more sales were made to the Indians.

Last week all sales were discontinued, draft beer apparatus was dismantled and Mahnomen is now back where it was before the days of the eighteenth amendment, dry by federal fiat and under the autheritihy of the old time "pussyfoots."

A meeting was then held to see if any arrangements could be made with the authorithies to continue the sale of the non-intoxicating beverage.

Indian Relief Agent Flinn was present and told of the difficulty that he has had with his force of workers, who are drawing cash for their labors but are still calling for rations, spending all of their cash for beer and other things that are not necessary.

The old treaty specifically includes "beer" in its provisions, with no regard to its intoxicating qualities. Until some other congressional action is taken old Mahnomen will be in Indian territory.

Officials Predict New Wheat Acreage Cut

In view of the decrease of only 7.2 per cent in the acreage sown to winter wheat as reported in the U. S. summary of plantings just announced, farm administrator officials said additional acreage reduction might be necessary next spring.

The officials declared that of the acreage and probadly production at that time are in excess of the production figure set for the United States at the London conference last summer, a cut might be made in addition to the 15 per cent already contracted for by many wheat farmers.

This reduction if made would come through additional acreage cuts by farmers who have already signed production control contracts, the officials indicated.

Farmers would be allowed either to plow up or pasture additional planted acreage if the administration asks that it be retired from production.

Drivers Warned to Apply Early for License

You should make your application for driver's license promptly at the office of the clerk of the district court of your county or at the office of Geo. Fricker, local agent at Holt, Minn.

If you wait until the last minute, you will lose more time awaiting your turn to get the application and you may not be able to get your License until after March 1st.

In that case you will not be able to drive your car until you get the License.

More than five thousand licenses will have to be issued in Marshall County.

A. C. Swandby,
Clerk of District Court.

Announcement

A change of operators will take place at the local creamery on January 1st.

Walter Larson taking over the duties as manager and buttermaker on that date.

Mr. Larson needs no introduction to the people of this community, having served as helper at the local creamery for about two years, and for the past four years has been manager of the Cooperative Creamery at Bronson, Minn.

According to recommendations from our fieldman Mr. Omodt, he has proven himself an outstanding man, both as a buttermaker and manager, having an average efficiency score of almost 99 being the highest of any buttermaker in this district for the past two years.

We therefore ask all patrons of this community to bid Mr. Larson a hearty welcome and give him your true cooperation in the future.

Wishing you all a happy and prosperous New Year.

The Creamery Board.

Transients To Register In Marshall County

The state board of Control has designated the county Relief Office as the Registration point for all transient people in Marshall County under the supervision of Stephen S. Easter, county relief worker. This includes transient families as well as single people. It is part of a nationwide program to get accurate check on these moving people who have no longer a home anywhere.

In Minnesota it is intended to furnish a home for individuals in central camps, similar to the Civel Conservation Camps. In these camps men will have a permanent home where they may work for their living somewhat on the order of the CCC camps. The transients are considered as any family who have recently moved in the county from other states or other counties in Minnesota, as well as families who may be temporarily stranded here or individuals who are drifting through the community. "What should we do with the fellow who comes begging at the door for food and clothes?" You should send him to the county relief office in the basement of the Court House in Warren. There he will be registered, his other immediate needs cared for and he will be directed to a central point where he may find a permanent home.

Acceptance of the plan is entirely optional with the individual.

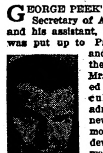
Controversy With Secretary Wallace Forces Peek Into a New Job—Education Begun In CCC Camps—Bullitt's Extraordinary Reception in Russia.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD



George Peek

GEORGE PEEK'S controversy with Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and his assistant, Professor Tugwell, was put up to President Roosevelt and he speedily found the way to settle it. Mr. Peek was persuaded to resign as agricultural adjustment administrator and a new position much more to his liking was devised for him. He was called a special assistant to the President and named to head a temporary committee that will recommend permanent machinery for coordination of government efforts to expand foreign trade.

The committee also will include the members of the two departmental committees, the inter-departmental advisory board on reciprocal treaties, inter-departmental trade policy committees, and such other individuals as Peek may select.

In a formal statement the White House said: "The report of the committee and final action is expected within two weeks."

It continued: "George Peek, agricultural adjustment administrator, having completed the organization period of the AAA, is designated to head this committee as a special assistant to the President on American trade policy."

The new organization "to correlate the internal adjustment of production with such effective foreign purchasing power as may be developed by reciprocal tariffs, barter, and other international arrangements," will be headed by Mr. Peek when it is completed.

The administration expects to bring about modification of some most-favored nation treaties so as to make possible special treatment of liquor imports from countries agreeing to take more of this country's surplus farm products. This is not regarded as a great difficulty to Mr. Peek, as it is a favorite theme with him that trade amounts to "swapping my jack-knife for your marbles."

Trade, to him, whether on a domestic or international basis, is just what the word signifies, and he says that in its transaction "we sometimes have to sleep with people we don't like and sometimes with those we like."

SECRETARY WALLACE and his more radical associates in the Department of Agriculture won a victory in the transfer of Mr. Peek, but they also suffered a rebuff, for in composing the difficulties the President transferred from the AAA to the NRA the grocery and several other food codes which were among the things that Wallace and Peek could not agree upon. The latter had opposed various radical provisions in those codes, and these have been mostly eliminated by the NRA, or at least modified.

However, the main point of difference between the two men was the effectiveness of marketing agreements in the agricultural relief program. This was questioned by Wallace in a recent press conference and he suggested the major necessity in farm relief was strict restriction of crop production. Peek had emphasized marketing agreements rather than crop control methods, while Tugwell and other liberals had taken the opposite position.

Chester Davis

CHESTER DAVIS, who was slated to succeed Mr. Peek as administrator of the AAA, has been in charge of the crop control section. Though long a close friend of Mr. Peek, he sided with Secretary Wallace and Assistant Secretary Tugwell in the dispute. However, he defended Mr. Peek against assertions that the latter's presence in the administration had delayed prosecution of the crop control program. He pointed to the control plans for wheat, cotton, hogs, tobacco and other commodities placed in operation, and said:

"The record of the past six months would have been impossible without the continued co-operation of Mr. Peek. It is absolutely untrue that he obstructed progress."

With Mr. Peek moved to a new post, officials associated with him were considering plans for extensive revision of the methods of handling marketing agreements in the AAA. It has been virtually decided to scrap the two main divisions, crop control and processing and marketing.

AGRICULTURAL leaders from all over the land gathered in Chicago for the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau federation, and gave their full support and approval to the farm relief policies of the President. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the federation, called the federal farm adjustment act the "Magna Charta of agriculture," saying that "at last farmers have the machinery and the power to obtain a fair share of the consumer's dollar." For forty years, he said, the farmer has been getting less and less of this dollar, but by use of the full powers of the agricultural adjustment administration, he declared, this trend can be turned the other way.

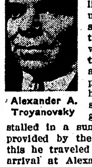
From Mr. Roosevelt came a letter full of optimism which was read to the delegates. The President, who is a member of the New York state farm bureau, expressed appreciation for the federation's support and outlined the first effects of federal money "getting into the hands of people who need it," yet he cautioned farmers and others to "guard against letting a rise in farm income tempt us to forget the realities of supply and demand."

Secretary Wallace and Mr. Peek both were on the list of speakers and were well received.

LATEST of the farm relief experiments, a $350,000,000 campaign to control the production of corn and hogs by paying federal bounties to the producers, was launched by Secretary Wallace. The money will be raised by processing taxes which the consumer will pay and will go to farmers who sign agreements to reduce their average of corn and production of hogs in 1934.

Benefit payments on corn, under the program, will be at the rate of 30 cents a bushel for each bushel the farmer agrees to withhold from production in 1934. The payment will be based on the average yield of the contracted acreage during the previous five-year period. One-half the payment will be made to the farmer as soon as his contract has been approved, the other half when he has fulfilled the terms of the agreement.

In return for the farmers' agreement to curtail hog production the government will pay $5 a head on 75 per cent of the average number of hogs marketed or to be marketed from litters farrowed by the producers' sows in the last two years.



Alexander A. Troyanovsky

WILLIAM C. BULLITT, ambassador to Russia, was received in Moscow in a manner entirely unprecedented since the establishment of the Soviet regime. Other envoys on arrival at the capital have been accorded little or no attention until they have presented their credentials; but Mr. Bullitt was greeted with extraordinary enthusiasm by officials and populace alike. When he crossed the Russian frontier at Negoreloge he was installed in a sumptuous private car provided by the government and in this he traveled to Moscow. On his arrival at Alexandrovsky station he was met by cheering crowds and was formally presented to Alexander A. Troyanovsky, who is coming to Washington as Russian ambassador, and to Alexis Neuman, vice director of the Soviet press department.

The new envoy's first official act was to pay a formal call upon Foreign Minister Maxim Litvinov, with whom he remained a half hour.

He was installed in the National hotel, which thus became a temporary American embassy, and atop the building the Star-Spangled Banner was raised, flying thus for the first time in Soviet Russia.

Mr. Bullitt himself and his nine-year-old daughter occupy an elaborate three-room apartment which last summer was tenanted by Col. and Mrs. Charles A. Lindbergh.

ROBERT FECHNER, director of emergency conservation work, announced that a great program for education of the 300,000 men in the civilian conservation corps had been approved by the President and was being put into effect immediately. Educational advisers to the number of 1,465 are being placed in the forest work camps and an individual program of instruction for each camp is being developed. To a considerable extent the advisers are drawn from lists of unemployed teachers that have been submitted to Dr. George F. Zook, federal commissioner of education, by state directors of education.

The opportunity for education will be offered to all members of the corps, but participation in the courses of instruction will not be mandatory.

The available working hours on forestry projects—40 hours per week—will not be disturbed. The plan is to utilize hours other than normal working periods and periods of inclement weather for purposes of instruction.

General and vocational subjects will be offered, although most of the instruction will be of an informal nature.

Four government departments—Interior, War, Labor and Agriculture—will co-operate in establishing and operating the new educational system. The nine major-generals commanding corps areas will be charged with the responsibility for carrying out the program.

ERNEST T. WEIR of Pittsburgh, chairman of the Weirton Steel company, has defied the federal labor board and flatly refused to abide by the rules it announced to guide an election of employees' representatives for collective bargaining. In a letter to Senator R. D. Wagner, chairman of the board, Mr. Weir said:

"We must consider any arrangements with you terminated and the election will proceed in accordance with the rules adopted by the employees' organization."

Informed later that Chairman Wagner had announced the board would enforce its agreement to supervise the election at the Weirton and Clarksburg, W. Va., and Steubenville, Ohio, plants, Weir reiterated "my letter stands."

NOW a wife may testify in a federal court in behalf of her husband in criminal cases, for the old legal rule forbidding this has been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The case, which came on appeal from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, was that of the United States versus John S. Funk of Rockingham, N. C., who was charged and found guilty of conspiracy to violate the prohibition law. Funk was twice tried and at each trial his wife was excluded from testifying in his behalf on the ground of incompetency.

"The rules of the common law which disqualified as witnesses persons having an interest long since in the main have been abolished both in England and in this country, and what was once regarded a sufficient ground for excluding the testimony of such persons altogether has come," the Supreme court held, "to be uniformly and more sensibly regarded as affecting the credit of the witness only."

ALEXANDER LEGGE, by a gift of $400,000 some time prior to his recent death and a legacy of $500,000 in his will, brought to completion months of work to perfect a philanthropic organization to be known philanthropic organization to be known as the Farm Foundation, it was made known by Frank O. Lowden, former governor of Illinois, and chairman of the foundation.

In developing his project, whose funds and activities will be devoted to the improvement of "the social, cultural and economic conditions of rural life," Mr. Lowden disclosed, Mr. Legge enlisted as trustees a group of twenty industrialists, educators, capitalists and farm leaders from all parts of the country.

WHEN Col. Charles A. Lindbergh starts out to do something in the way of aviation, he does it competently, skilfully and neatly. Accompanied and ably assisted by Mrs. Lindbergh, he piloted his big monoplane across the southern Atlantic from Bathurst, Gambia, Africa, to Natal, Brazil, making the 1,875 miles in 16 hours and 10 minutes and landing smoothly in the Natal harbor, where the entire population of the city was gathered to welcome them. Through the long flight Mrs. Lindbergh at the wireless instrument kept in constant communication with Rio de Janeiro.

After a brief stop in Natal the colonel and his wife took off for another leg on their homeward flight, this time flying to Para and thence nearly a thousand miles up the Amazon river to Manaos, where they made a perfect landing in a tropical rain. Their route took them over the vast Brazilian jungle and forests.

DOWN in Montevideo the Pan-American conference was talking about ways of ending the Chaco war between Bolivia and Paraguay, without getting anywhere. Meanwhile the forces of those countries were exceedingly busy in the jungle, with the result that the Paraguayans captured more than 13,000 Bolivian troops, with most of their officers. In one engagement more than 600 Bolivians were killed, according to the official announcement.

SPANISH anarchists started a bloody revolt against the republic in the northeastern part of the country and it soon spread to Madrid and further south. There were sanguinary conflicts between the rebels and the troops and police and bombings in the capital and elsewhere were frequent. Scores were killed in street fighting, and hundreds of agitators were placed under arrest. After several days of ineffectual efforts to overcome the civil guards the anarchists resorted to their strongest weapon and proclaimed a nation-wide revolutionary strike. The order was issued through the National Confederation of Labor, which is controlled by the syndicalists.

MEMBERS of the senate finance and house ways and means committee in joint session received the administration's liquor tax program which includes the strongly opposed levy of $2.60 a gallon on distilled spirits. Alcohol Administrator Choate and other officials were called before the committees as witnesses, and Acting Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau was summoned to discuss the projected general revision of the income tax and other revenue laws.

The administration's liquor program also includes sharing of the revenue with the states to avert duplication of gallonage imposts, and authority for the President to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with foreign liquor exporting countries.

It proposes that states entering into agreements with the federal government not to impose special liquor levies shall receive 20 per cent of the revenue gathered on the federal levy.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette. Two Frenchmen, the comte De Corlay and his son Robert, claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A French sailor, Sebastien, also knows of the treasure, and is seeking it. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, which is not where it had been supposed, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay warns Tom that Sebastien is clever and unscrupulous. They reach an understanding to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered.

"Because we hadn't the remotest idea that Sebastien knew what we were up to and was taking measures to let us down. Papa and I got a fearful knockdown when you mentioned another crew that looked like Miquelon men. Before that we had thought we might as well reconnoiter a little before spending any more money. We made the usual French mistake of trying to cut down the overhead, as your mine-sweeping chaps used to say when they cut loose a mine. I was with them when they were based on Lorient."

"Sebastien's apt to find it out at any minute, now," Tom said, "if he hasn't learned it already."

"You're right. We haven't an hour to lose. That's why I'm making you this offer. It ought to prove a goodish bit, unless that old duck, my revered ancestor, was dippy."

"By gum, I believe you, Bob. Well then, we'll agree to split three ways, and here's my fist on it."

"You're on, Tom." And they clasped hands.

Robert's trained eyes, better far than Tom's, because they had not been frequently tormented by a typewriting machine, immediately picked up the dark splotch on the smooth surface about a furlong ahead and the same distance inshore of them. He perceived also something that Tom had missed against the opaque background of rocks and trees.

"I say, Tom, that boat is yawl rigged."

Tom was able to see then, as the boat came abeam, that Robert was right. The fact was significant, as except for yachts and the larger fishing vessels, sail had become a relic of the past for the small craft of that coast. Even when used, the rig preferred was almost always that of sloop or schooner. But the Canadians had stuck to their time-honored yawls and ketches.

If the passing boat, that was running under auxiliary motor power, had been a small yacht, she most probably would have been painted white and have shown sailing lights. As neither of these details was in evidence, Tom's suspicions became aroused immediately. It was more than possible that Sebastien, learning of the De Corlays' arrival on the scene, had decided that no more time was to be lost, and was now on his way to the Corvette ledge to begin his diving operations.

"By golly, Bob, that's our bird," said Tom.

"I believe you," Robert answered quietly.

Tom slowed the motor of the launch, then turned the spokes until the heavy boat described a wide arc and fell into a following position about a quarter of a mile astern of the cruiser, and directly in her wake.

CHAPTER V

Fairly convinced that Jessica was right about the wreck of the Fourquet, Doctor White did not allow the barnacles to form upon his motionless keel. He ate a hurried supper, then jumped aboard his launch and ran over to the village to take counsel of that local oracle and information bureau which is the general storekeeper.

"There's a diver right now over to Friendship," said the storekeeper. "David MacFarlane. He lives there. Trades up and down whenever there's a job at Bath or Boothbay or Rockland."

"The boat builder? Why, of course. I never thought of Dave. You think he's got all the gear?"

"Sure thing, doctor. Dave's getting pretty old to go down himself, and I heard the other day that he's been laid up with sciatica. But he's got a 'Gese working for him that he has trained, and they say he's a first rate hand."

Here seemed the constellations in their proper places for a venture. The storekeeper went upstairs to his private apartment over the store and getting Dave MacFarlane on the telephone made strong and urgent representations. The name of Doctor White was, as has been stated, one to conjure by, which was well, as no man whose name is honorably prefixed with a Mac is apt to undertake in haste what may prove to be a fool's errand.

But such was the esteem in which Doctor White was bespoken that the master diver promised to despatch his understudy within the hour, that he might make the twenty mile run around Pemaquid point to Whale island while the weather was clear and the sea smooth. Such a flat calm was apt to be followed by thick fog toward morning; and the rocks were many and varied.

Doctor White returned to his demesne jubilant, and in a state of suppressed excitement. Halfway up the big natural stone steps laid down on the path to the house stood Jessica with a few sprays of the first goldenrod in her hand. Doctor White, who knew the language of flowers as well as their medical properties, shook his head.

"Do you know the warning of goldenrod, my dear?"

"Hay fever," said Jessica.

"Sometimes, but fortunately we don't have that pest here. They say 'Be cautious.'"

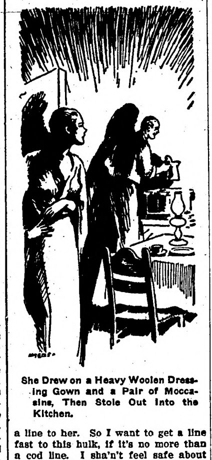
"Of what?"

"Of sunken wrecks—if they happen to be your most immediate interest." And he told her about the diver.

"Then that's all right," said Jessica. "What a lark, Gardy!"

"Perhaps. But this obviates the necessity of your being a mudlark. You don't need to go overboard tomorrow morning."

"I want to, though. There's a reason. Father was talking about salvage claims one day, and I remember his saying that ever since there had been any laws at all about marine property, the first claim on a vessel in danger or derelict or wrecked was that of a line to her. So I want to get a line fast to this hulk, if it's no more than a cod line. I sha'n't feel safe about her until I do."



She Drew on a Heavy Woolen Dressing Gown and a Pair of Moccasins, Then Stole Out Into the Kitchen.

The doctor nodded. "Like staking a mining claim until you can have it recorded."

"Nobody has located the wreck," said Jessica, "because they went on Tom's assumption that she hit the Corvette ledge and then drifted clear. They never thought of her having hit McFarlane's ledge."

* * * * * * *

Some time in the night Jessica awoke and heard the breakers pounding against the shore, and the muffled blare of the Monhegan fog siren, fourteen miles away. A moment later the pulsing growl of Sequin reported the sea about itself to be shrouded likewise. The waves made a crashing sound, pounding against the shore.

She wondered if the diver from Friendship had arrived and was moored safely off the landing in the sheltered little thoroughfare. If this indeed were the case they would be glad of the fog to screen their early morning operations.

Jessica slipped from bed, went to a window and looked out. She did not look very far out, because her vision fetched up against a black murk as solid and as still as the lower level of a coal mine. The sirens alone were audibly deploring its dangers. "Whoo-ooo-up," sighed Monhegan, and far to the westward Seguin answered crossly, "Rur 'rur 'rupp." It would not be precisely the sort of morning that a sybarite would choose for a sea bath, Jessica thought. There might even be a good many needy folk who would not have gone overboard and thirty feet deep into that glacial water for all the treasure at the bottom of the sea, but Jessica had not the slightest idea of abandoning the enterprise.

Meanwhile there seemed nothing much to do but to sleep, so she got back into bed again and slept. She awoke automatically at half past three, got up and lighted her lamp, then slipped off her nightdress and into a swimming suit. She drew on a heavy woolen dressing gown and a pair of moccasins, then stole out into the kitchen, to find Doctor White stealthily engaged in making coffee over the oil stove. There was need of silence, as all the treasure of Ophir and of Ind would not have countenanced that early morning expedition in Aunt Martha's eyes. It would have shaken her faith in her brother's sanity.

Doctor White himself protested it. He was worried also, because he had been down to the landing and failed to discover any sign of Dave MacFarlane's diver.

Idea of Game Preserve Suggested to Farmers

Operation of hunting preserves on waste land was advocated as a profitable venture for farmers by Aldo Leopold, wild game authority, before Friends of Our Native Landscape meeting at Madison, Wis.

"The best way is for a group of farmers to band together, set up a game management area, and then take the revenue which they can collect," Leopold said. "It is not a matter of legislation, but merely of getting into action. Under the law, they have a perfect right to post their land against unpermitted hunting and to charge for controlled hunting privileges on their lands."

Leopold said the land best suited to be set aside for game fowl is waste ground on the farm. Each unused plot, if fenced off and ungrazed by stock, will furnish food and cover for quail and grouse which maintain themselves with little help, he explained.

Once established, the game [illegible] requires little effort to maintain, Leopold said. The birds will [illegible] on natural weeds and grasses in preference to the farmers' seed crops, he said. One of the best covers can be provided by leaving brush piles on the ground after cutting wood, and planting wild grapevine at each pile. The grapevine soon covers the brush so that it furnishes effective cover for the birds, even when snow is deep on the ground.

Fruit Cake of High Quality

Many Ways of Making It, but All Have One Common Foundation—Liberality in Fruit for the Mixture Is Indispensable.

The other day, says a writer on home economics, some one asked me to define different types of fruit cakes according to their native origin. I quite blithely answered, "Why, certainly! English fruit cake is usually dark and southern fruit cake is usually light!" Then, upon looking up recipes in numerous books in my collection, I discovered that I had been too quick in my response. I was answering out of my experience in English and southern homes. I finds that the cook books do not agree with my own experiences and so I think I shall have to designate my fruit cake recipes in some other way, perhaps by their color.

While fruit cake recipes vary, they are all alike in one respect—they must contain plenty of fruit. The mixture which holds them together may be flavored in a variety of ways, and these flavorings are not only responsible for the variation in taste but also for the variation in color. The fruit content varies from the simplest type, which contains only raisins, to the most elaborate, which may have citron, apricots, pineapple, figs, currants, dates, or cherries, candied fruit peels, and almonds or pecans in addition. Old fruit cake recipes call for brandy or sherry to furnish the liquid. In the absence of these you will find fruit juices, cider, jelly, and coffee useful.

No matter what type of cake you decide to make, you must give it a long baking or combined steaming and baking. Some people find that the easiest way to bake a fruit cake is to steam it first! It will take about two and a half to three hours steaming and then it may be finished by taking an hour longer in a slow oven, to dry it out. A reader asks me to mention the type of utensils used when cakes and puddings are steamed. A regular "steamer" is, of course, easiest. Anything put in this type of steamer must be tightly covered with tin or oiled or parchment paper, or cellophane, held tightly in place by a rubber band or a string. If you haven't a steamer, you can easily manufacture one by using a large kettle and placing your puddings or cakes on a trivet or rack. You will have to renew the water more often in this makeshift arrangement, but it will be perfectly satisfactory.

Naturally the length of time for baking depends upon the size of the cake. Very small cakes will bake in an hour and a quarter, while the large cakes take as much as three hours. To prevent its browning too quickly, it is sometimes covered with paper, or if you are using a glass baking dish you may use the cover which comes with it. After the mixture is in the pans you may decorate the top with candied cherries and almonds in artistic arrangement.

I wonder if you have seen the ready-to-mix and bake fruit cake mixtures which have come on the market? Fruits and nuts of excellent quality cut in large pieces, as they should be for good and true fruit cakes, are combined with the dry ingredients ready for you to add the liquid. One of these products comes in a pan which is lined with paper into which the cake mixture may be put, back and baked. This pan may also be used with its cover for storing the cake. You will also find excellent ready baked fruit cakes in fancy boxes suitable for Christmas gifts.

One of my friends, an expert, who is the owner and manager of a well-known restaurant, told me a very interesting thing about keeping fruit cakes. After the cakes are baked and put away for storage she covers them with a layer of brown sugar, which keeps them moist and develops the flavors. I am passing this very valuable hint on to you. And don't forget that the sooner you make your cakes the better they will be at Christmas time!

Dark Fruit Cake

1 pound citron.
1 pound candied apricots.
1 pound candied pineapple.
1 pound candied cherries.
3 pounds seeded raisins.
1 pound currants.
½ pound raw almonds.
¼ pound flour.
1 teaspoon baking powder.
1 teaspoon cinnamon.
½ teaspoon cloves.
1 teaspoon nutmeg.
¼ pound butter.
½ pound brown sugar.
6 eggs.
1½ cups cider.
1 glass jelly.
Yield—10 pounds.

Cut into thin slices the citron, pineapple and apricots. Cut the cherries. Wash the raisins and currants and dry them. Blanch and chop the almonds. Mix these ingredients together. Sift flour with baking powder and spices. Combine fruit and flour mixtures thoroughly. Cream the butter and sugar. Add the egg yolks and then the cider and jelly alternately with the fruit mixture. Beat the egg whites until stiff and fold them into the fruit mixture. Grease the bottoms and sides of glass baking dishes and fill about three-fourths full. Decorate tops of cake with candied cherries and almonds. Cover and bake in a slow oven, 275 degrees Fahrenheit, 1¾ to 3 hours. The length of baking time will depend on the size of the baking dishes.

White Fruit Cake

1 cup seeded white raisins.
½ cup sliced orange peel.
½ cup sliced lemon peel.
½ cup sliced citron.
1 package shredded coconut.
1 cup blanched almonds.
2½ cups flour.
1 teaspoon baking powder.
¼ teaspoon salt.
½ cup shortening.
1 cup sugar.
3 eggs.
¼ cup sherry flavoring.
½ cup orange juice.

Wash raisins and drain well. Place raisins, fruit peels, coconut and coarsely chopped nut meats in bowl. Sift flour, baking powder and salt over fruit; mix fruit through the flour with fingers. Cream shortening, add sugar gradually, then beaten eggs. Add flavoring. Stir in fruits and flour mixture alternately with orange juice. Pour mixture into one large or several small greased tins. Bake in a slow oven, 300 degrees Fahrenheit. Makes three pounds.

Honey Fruit Cake

2 pounds raisins.
1 pound currants.
½ pound citron.
¼ pound candied orange peel.
¼ pound candied cherries.
½ pound dates.
½ pound figs.
½ pound blanched almonds.
½ pound flour.
½ pound shortening.
½ pound sugar.
6 eggs (well beaten).
1 cup sour milk.
1 cup honey.
½ cup currant jelly.
1½ teaspoons salt.
2 teaspoons nutmeg.
2 teaspoons cinnamon.
¼ teaspoon cloves.
1 teaspoon allspice.
¾ teaspoon soda.
1 teaspoon baking powder.

Chop fruit and nuts and dredge with one-half cup flour. Cream shortening and sugar until light and add the eggs, sour milk, honey, jelly. Mix thoroughly. Sift the remainder of the flour with the salt, spices, soda and baking powder and sift into the egg mixture. Beat until smooth and stir in the dredged fruit and nuts. Pour into well-greased baking dishes. Bake at 275 degrees Fahrenheit for 2½ hours. One-half hour before the cakes are done remove from the oven, brush over with honey and decorate as desired. Return to the oven to finish baking. Cool and then place covers on baking dishes, and if allowed to ripen three weeks or longer the cakes will be better. Makes nine pounds.

Variations in Colors of Locusts Explained

Mexican dispatches reporting that harmless green locusts not unlike ordinary American grasshoppers are turning red and communistic and are attacking vested institutions in the form of farmers' crops describe something neither so unique nor so mysterious as Mexican entomologists appear to believe. There can be no doubt that what is happening is merely another instance of the change of one form or "phase" of locust into another, as elucidated during the last few years by studies of African locusts by Dr. B. P. Uvarov of the British Imperial Institute of Entomology; by Prof. J. C. Faure of the University of South Africa, and others. In Africa, as elsewhere, the solitary locust usually is green or greenish yellow. The migratory locust, billions of which form the flying swarms sometimes even obscuring the sun, is red-brown or black. Once the two were deemed separate species. Now they are known to be two forms of the same one.

LARGE HEAD NOT SURE INDICATION OF BRAIN POWER

Is the size of our heads an index to our intelligence?

A Washington scientist has asked British members of parliament to let him have particulars of the length, breadth, and circumference of their heads. While at the moment he won't commit himself too far, he says that the brains of 100 eminent persons have been examined, and in the majority of cases the weight is above the average. And the size of the head is a guide to the size of the brain.

But it may be dangerous to form any too definite conclusions. The fact that epileptics usually have relatively large brains must, for instance, be taken into account. What is probably the largest brain ever measured belonged to an epileptoid idiot.

Then, taking the six next biggest brains on record, we get a very curious mixture. One of them belonged to Turgeniev, the Russian novelist, and another to Cuvier, the great zoologist. But three belonged to quite undistinguished individuals, and the sixth was an imbecile's.

Of the six largest women's brains—all smaller than any of those mentioned above—two belonged to lunatics, and a third to a medical student who committed suicide because she was afraid she had failed in her final examination. None of the others belonged to a person of eminence.

Other "guides to intelligence" are not much more helpful than size of head. One American scientist, as a result of investigations, came to the conclusion that the heaviest and tallest children were the most intelligent, but two other investigators, working in Iowa and Florence, arrived at a precisely opposite result.

In London elementary schools, it was found that stupid children tended to be below the average height, and clever children above it.—London Answers.

FIND THE TREND AND FOUNDATION OF CHILD FEARS

Despite the definite trend toward realism in modern life, children still are afraid of such supernatural manifestations as giants, witches, monsters, ghosts and devils. Mystery and gorilla movies, spooky stories, radio crime programs, and even lurid pictures in newspapers produce distinct fears, while kidnaping retains—even before the sensational kidnaping wave of the past two years—a large element of dreaded fear for many children.

These findings are among the many derived from an exhaustive study of children's fears, desires and fancies just completed by Dr. Arthur T. Jersild, assistant professor of education and research of the Child Labor Development institute, Teachers' college, Columbia university. Doctor Jersild studied 400 children, ages five to twelve, in public and private schools of New York. He delved into their dreams, asked them what they would do if they had a million dollars, and whether they preferred to be boys or girls.

One of the most surprising findings was the fears of the occult, the supernatural, of mystery, skeletons, corpses and deaths. Twenty-one per cent of the children classed these as their "worst fears." The younger children expressed fear of animals, while seven per cent were primarily afraid of robbers, kidnapers and others of the criminal class. Doctor Jersild said the fear of kidnaping had been engendered by conversation and stories, often by parents, for all but twelve of the 400 children had been interviewed before the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby, early in 1932.—Literary Digest.

This Wonderful World

We know a man who moved away from a big city to a small town so he could have some peace and leisure. Now he has moved back to the city again.

He told us that the little towns and the big towns are all alike. Something going on all the time in both places—dinners, parties, suppers, entertainments, clubs, everybody everywhere on the jump, nobody hardly ever at home, men worn out and women tired to death.

But, maybe this man we are talking about is nothing but an old crab. An old cynic who can't see that the world is so full of such wonderful things we should all be as happy as kings.—John Steven McGroarty, in the Los Angeles Sunday Times.

On the Funny Side

TREAT FOR THE WIFE

The hour of midnight was just striking as the householder crept silently down the stairs. With a quick movement he snapped on the electric light and gasped as his eyes fell on a burglar tampering with his safe.

"Jove, a real burglar!" he smiled. "Wait a minute, will you?"

The burglar prepared to make his escape.

"While you call a copper, eh?" he said. "Not me!"

"No," said the householder. "Only wait while I call my wife. She's heard you every night for 15 years, and it'll be a real pleasure to her to see you at last."

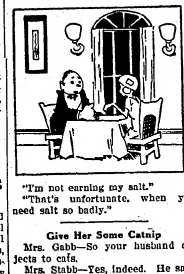
NICELY PUT



"I'm not earning my salt."

"That's unfortunate, when you need salt so badly."

CAMOUFLAGE

Biggs, the manager of the restaurant, was talking in undertones to his head chef.

Afterwards he called all his waitresses into his private office.

"Girls," he said, "I want you all to look your very best today. Add an extra dab of powder to your cheeks and take a little more care with your hair."

"Why, what's the matter?" asked the head waitress. "Butter bad again?"

"No," said the manager; "the beef's tough."—London Tit-Bits.

SO BE THANKFUL

THIS year, more than for several years that have passed, people are going to be thankful. They are going to be thankful that the NRA has set the wheels of industry going around again, that a lot of boys who had become discouraged walking city streets have had a healthful recuperative life in the woods preserving forests that they hardly knew existed before, and that optimism has become the national fashion once more.

The family is going to be thankful that a feast is in the making, out in the kitchen, that mince pies smell spicy and savory in the cooking and that turkeys roasting smell like nothing in the world but turkeys roasting. It is important, then, in this general spirit of thankfulness that the housekeeper as well as her family should have a share in being thankful. Preparedness is her problem.

It's Easy This Way

Prepare the turkey the day before; prepare the dressing also, but don't stuff the fowl with it until it is ready to go into the roasting oven. Do your marketing on Tuesday so that early Wednesday morning the supplies will be delivered. While you are waiting for the delivery, polish your silver, press your linens and have everything ready for the table. Wednesday evening you can arrange your centerpiece, with leisure to enjoy the task. Borrow from nature when you plan your centerpiece. Polish a beautiful pumpkin or a squash and fill it with glowing apples, grapes, russet pears and bright oranges. Arrange some winter berries or Japanese lantern pods around the base of the centerpiece.

Here is a menu especially designed to make the housewife, as well as the family, thankful that it is feast day:

Thanksgiving Dinner

Sardine Points
Orange Cups
Pickled Crabapples Celery Curls
Roast Turkey Bread Stuffing
Giblet Gravy
Whipped Potatoes
Baked Hubbard Squash
Creamed Cauliflower
Frozen Cranberries
Dressed Assorted Salad Greens
Pilgrim Father's Pudding
English Toffee Coffee
Salted Nuts, and Raisins

Sardine Points: Mash the sardines from one 4-ounce can of boneless sardines, add two teaspoons lemon juice, two tablespoons chopped walnuts, two tablespoons chopped stuffed olives, two tablespoons chopped celery and three tablespoons mayonnaise. Mix well. Fill caviar puffs with this mixture, or spread it on triangles of toast. Carnish with a slice of olive. These may be served with some iced beverage before going in to dinner.

Orange Cups: Scrub four California oranges and cut in halves with a saw-edged knife. Scoop out the pulp and remove all the white fibre from it. Keep the skins in cold water while preparing the filling. For the filling add the contents of a No. 2 can of crushed pineapple to the orange pulp, and then add fresh mint syrup. Drain the orange cups dry, dip the edges in a thick sugar syrup, then in finely chopped mint, making a green rim. Fill with the fruit mixture. Put two or three after-dinner mints in the center of each.

Frozen Cranberries: Boil one-fourth cup sugar and three-fourths cup water to form a thin syrup. Soak one-half tablespoon of gelatin in two tablespoons cold water, dissolve in the hot syrup and add two tablespoons lemon juice and one-half cup of orange juice. Add the contents of one No. 2 can of cranberry sauce which has been finely mashed. Freeze to a mush. Fold in the stiffly-beaten white of one egg which has been strained. Pack in a 4-to-1 ice and salt mixture and freeze.

Pilgrim Father's Pudding: Beat two eggs, add one-third cup melted butter and two-thirds cup diluted evaporated milk. Add the following sifted dry ingredients: two cups flour, four teaspoons baking powder and one-fourth teaspoon salt. Then using one-half cup of orange marmalade (or any kind of jam or preserves), put one teaspoon of marmalade in each greased individual mold. Pour in the batter and steam for thirty-five minutes. Serve with the following

Sauce: Cream together six tablespoons butter and one cup confectioner's sugar, then add the grated rind of two oranges, three well-beaten egg yolks and six tablespoons of orange juice. Fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of the three eggs. Serve cold over the hot pudding.*

Holt Cafe Robbed Saturday Money And Cigarettes Taken

Some one whom was evidently a little low on small change and not very particular about the brand of cigarettes he smokes, took the liberty early Saturday morning of opening up the Holt Cafe and helping themselves to a pretty good share of each.

The burglars gained entrance to the restaurant by jimmying the back door and breaking the night lock. Theo. Ness, owner of the place reported that about forty-five dollars in cash and ten dollar worth of cigurettes were stolen besides a good wrist watch he kept in the safe which was also gone thru.

This is the second time that the Holt Cafe has been robbed since Ness took it over.

The back door at the Dew Drop Inn was also forced the same night but the night bolt would not break so the job of breaking in there was given up when the door casing sprung lose.

Re-numbering Of State Roads Will Mean Many Changes

Engineers of the Minnesota highway department have just pieced together the state's biggest jig-saw puzzle.

Handed 140 new state trunk routes covering 4,500 miles of roads, the Highway department undertook the task of co-ordinating and consolidating the new mileage with 6,800 miles of the original trunk system made up of 71 state routes and 16 U. S. routes.

Out of this total of 227 different routes, the department has laid out a consolidated state trunk system of 125 routes covering 11,300 miles of highways. The result is a radically changed state highway map which will go into effect in the early spring of 1934 when the new route signs have been put in place.

In announcing completion of the renumbering plan for the enlarged trunk system, the Highway department also announced that the entire 4,500 miles of new routes were officially taken into the state system in the last week of December. Addition of the roads to the trunk system was authorized by the regular session of the 1933 legislature, but lack of funds prevented the Highway department from taking over the routes until now, it was explained by N. W. Elsborg, highway commissioner.

"From now on", said Mr. Elsberg, "the entire 11,500 miles of trunk routes will be maintained and improved by the state from proceeds of motor vehicle license fees and the state gas tax. No real estate or personal property taxes are levied for state roads. The increase of approximately 65 per cent in trunk mileage which the highway department must maintain in the future will mean that more money must be spent for maintenance, leaving less for construction.

"In renumbering the system, we endeavered to keep the total number of routes as low as possible, to extend existing routes where practical and to eliminate the confusion caused by the former practice of having some routes carry different state and U. S. numbers.

"U. S. routes in the renumbered system will carry only their U. S. number, which is a great convenience to tourists and in line with national practice."

For example, U. S. trunk No. 61 in the old system followed Minnesota trunk No. 3 from La-Crosse to the Twin Cities and Minnesota No. 1 from there to Canada. In the new system U. S. 61 carries no number but its own.

Minnesota Trunk Highway No. 1 in the new system will extend east and west across the state from Little Marais through Ely, Northome, Thief River Falls and Warren to the North Dakota line. One reason for making this route new No. 1 was its length, permitting use of the old No. 1 signs, thousands of which would have been wasted if a shorter route had received the designation.

Mr. and Mrs. Theo. Ness, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fricker, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Larson, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Peterson and family and Oscar Fosholm were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Gunheim New Year's eve.

Most Of Nation's Bank Depositors Now Insured

Washington —AP— President Roosevelt was informed Monday night that 97 per cent of the nation's bank depositors would be insured under the new deposit insurance which became effective on Tuesday.

Walter J. Cummings, chairman of the federal deposit insurance corporation, reported to Mr. Roosevelt that deposits in 13,423 banks will be insured. He said only 141 banks had been found ineligible and predicted a number of them might be insured by making certain corecctions.

Thus, Tuesday for the first time in American history depositors of sums up to $2,500 were insured against loss. After July 1 this insurance will be increased to $10,000.

"I congratulate you," wrote President Roosevelt in response to the report of Cummings, and E. G. Bennett and J. F. T. O'Connor, "because you have in these few months accomplished with complete success a gigantic task which the pessimists said could not possibly be done before January 1. That 97 per cent of the bank depositors of the nation are insured will give renewed faith."

All national banks and members of the federal reserve system automatically are insured under the new federal law. To become members of the federal insurance gugrantee, state banks were required to meet riged conditions by federal authorities.

Minnesota Spends 69 Million In 1933

Expenditures for state governmental activities during 1933 totaled $69,898,264.67, raised through property and special taxes, according to a report made by State Auditor Stafford King.

Although the expenditures are $12,472,923 lower than last year, the 1933 total represents an increase of $21,547,497 over the disbursements made during 1924, according to a ten year comparative compilation.

During the ten year period a total of $515,055,263.32 has been expended, with more than two-thirds of the money going for construction and maintenance of state highways and for educational purposes, including regular and special aid to public schools.

The peak year of state expenditures was in 1932 when the total disbursement reached $82,371,690, according to the ten year survey made by King. Starting in 1924 with a total outlay of $49,350,767.75 an upward trend in expenditures is noted with $52,260,396.58 for 1925; $52,698,740.78 in 1926; $55,033,-9 2.12 in 1927; $54,762,448.95 in 1928; $55,533,001.34 in 1929; $64,711,349.42 in 1930; and $79,435,184.07 in 1931. The 1933 expenditures show the first drop in the upward disbursement trend.

Mr. and Mrs. Sam Brown of Aneta, N. Dak., and Mr. and Mrs. Ed Roll of Grand Forks visited at the Christ Engen home during the Christmas holidays.

Hans P. Wahlin and family whom had made their home here the past five years pulled out on Saturday for Evansville, Minn., where they will make their home on a farm they own.

Shipping Association Held Annual Meeting In Rosewood

Rosewood' Minn. —At the 17th annual meeting of Rosewood Shipping Associatson here last Wednesday the following officers were elected for next year. Pres. Harry Myrom, vice pres. Carl Mellem, secy. Joel E. Shoberg and manager-treasurer, Emil Anderson. The board of directors include Gust Nakken John Sjolsvold, Martin Nelson, O. K. Ose and Christ Berg.

Athorative figures covering one carload was not available at the meeting but the secretaries records showed that 26 carloads had been shipped during the year, and these had contained slightly more than 1500 head of stock, hogs and sheep and the gross receipts of the year will be approximately $14,800 and the net at home $1200. This is the largest volume in the history of the association.

Owing to the extremely cold weather the meeting was not largely attended and it was decided that the annual meeting date be changed to the last Tuesday evening of October, to afford better travel conditions for members living at a distance. After Jan. 1st 1934 two separate sales copies covering each load shipped will be required from the commission firm handling the stock, one copy to be sent to the manager and the other to the secretary. Free lunch was served by the association to those attending.

Weir's Conflict With National Labor Board—Johnson Plans Realignment of Code Authorities—Welles Quits Cuba but Disorder Continues.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

E. T. Weir

WHAT action, if any, the NRA and the national labor board would take in the case of the Weirton Steel company was unrevealed by the authorities. E. T. Weir, chairman of the board of the company, maintained that he was loyal to the President's recovery program but insisted that the labor board had no right to coerce or abrogate the election of employees' representatives that was held at the Weirton plant. The successful candidates were hand-picked, and so were those who were defeated, all being "company men." Members of the workers' union, the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers, did not appear on the ballots. Union representatives charged that workers were threatened with loss of their jobs if they didn't vote, and said many of the men deliberately spoiled their ballots.

There were ugly threats that if the government did not act the workers would begin to "take things apart."

"We are putting our faith in President Roosevelt and the NRA," said one of the union leaders. "They've promised to see this case through. Well, if they don't then we'll be forced to take things into our own hands. Because we're going to win this fight."

Thomas E. Millsop, assistant to President Williams, said the only way the government would be allowed to enter the matter was on the strength of a court order.

"We are for the NRA," he said, "but there are some parts of the recovery law which frankly we do not like. It's no secret that Weirton Steel is opposed to a closed shop, which is what the labor provisions of the act mean. Nor is it any secret that we do not intend to recognize the Amalgamated."

He still insisted that the "company union" was not a company union at all but an association of employees' representatives chosen by free and untrammeled ballot by the workers.

Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, NRA administrator, refused to comment on published reports that President William Green of the American Federation of Labor will demand a clear cut statement from the recovery administration and the national labor board outlawing company financed unions.

GENERAL JOHNSON has mapped out a new alignment of code authorities in order to provide more effective representation of consumers' interests. His plan is to place on every code authority one NRA representative selected by the administrator. This representative will be assisted by two "advisors," one drawn from the ranks of labor, and nominated by the labor advisory board of NRA, and the other to be nominated by the consumers advisory board.

An important part of Johnson's announcement was that he proposes to give the NRA representatives on each code authority a veto power over any of the actions the authority may elect to take.

In other words, in the "self government" of each industry, which the general has often discussed as his aim, a code authority may decide to take some step with respect to prices, or production, or wages. If it suits the NRA representative, it will be put into effect; otherwise he can veto the action.

The administrator also announced the appointment of Leon Henderson of the Russell Sage foundation, New York, and S. J. Schlink, a director of the Consumers' Research bureau, as special assistants in the consumers division of the NRA. He emphasized that Mrs. Mary Rumsey, society woman who heads the consumers advisory board, would retain her present post and expressed satisfaction with her work. Henderson and Schlink, he said, will be given every opportunity to study the consumers' problems within the NRA organization and will make their reports direct to him.

YEARLY reports of Secretary Roper of the Commerce department and Secretary Wallace of agriculture were of a nature to cheer up President Roosevelt and all the supporters of his policies. Mr. Roper submitted facts and figures showing that considerable progress toward business recovery had been made in the United States as a result of decisive action by the government, and that there were definite signs of a business revival throughout the world. He also reported that, in line with the administration's economy program, he had brought about drastic reorganization in his department and had cut expenditures 28.8 per cent compared with those of the previous year.

Secretary Wallace reported the 1933 farm income at $6,100,000,000, against $5,143,000,000 last year; exclusive of $300,000,000 in crop reduction benefits to be paid by the government before the end of the year.

The secretary indorsed controlled inflation as a means of promoting social justice through fairer distribution of national income. But he reminded farmers that depreciation of the dollar acts unequally on different agricultural products and of itself does nothing to correct production maladjustments.

"Currency policies," Wallace said, "may stimulate our exports temporarily, but should not lead us to think a worldwide demand exists for our surpluses, unless sufficient changes have been made in our tariffs to build up increased foreign purchasing power."

Sec'y Roper

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT let it be known that the interdepartmental committee on communications headed by Secretary of Commerce Roper had completed its study of the matter and laid its report before him. This report will be submitted to congress, and may result in legislation for rigid government regulation of telegraph, telephone and radio companies, the reorganization of the whole communications industry and some huge mergers. The committee favors a trend toward monopoly subjected to strict federal supervision. Outright government ownership is an alternative.

The President probably expected this monopoly proposal would arouse opposition, and it appeared immediately from some of the liberals. Senator Borah, for instance, said: "Better leave that alone. Such a proposal has made me determined to introduce a bill restoring the Sherman antitrust law as a part of the basic principles of the NRA."

ONE of the encouraging signs of the times is the decision of the Van Swearingen railroads to purchase $25,000,000 worth of rolling stock, this being the biggest order for equipment authorized in many years. The purchases will be financed by the PWA. The railroads will buy the equipment with the proceeds of 4 per cent fifteen-year equipment trust certificates sold to the government. In this way the government will obtain security for its loan without receiving as collateral bonds or other evidences of mortgaged indebtedness. By contrast, the RFC demands bonds as security where possible. The roads are the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Nickle Plate and the Erie.

AL SMITH has not let up in his criticism of the administration's monetary policies, but he gives President Roosevelt full credit for having brought about prohibition repeal. At a dinner of the Manhattan club in New York Mr. Smith praised Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler and others for their work against the Eighteenth amendment, and added: "The one man who put over repeal now is the President of the United States."

CHEERED and honored by hundreds of Americans and Cubans, but snubbed by the Grau government, Sumner Welles departed from Havana by plane to Miami on his way to Washington, where he assumes his former post as head of the Latin American affairs bureau in the Department of State. Jefferson Caffery, who succeeds him in Havana, will be, for the present, the personal representative of President Roosevelt rather than ambassador. Whether he will be able to do more than Mr. Welles in the way of restoring peace and prosperity in Cuba is a question.

Jefferson Caffery

Col. Carlos Mendieta, leading oppositionist, said that the strife, with no end in sight, is keeping the island sunk in economic bankruptcy and threatened by strikes. He said the nation resents control by a government backed by army dictatorship and the student directorate, composed of 11 youths with decidedly Communistic leanings.

El Pais, the big Havana daily that has been attacking Grau's government, was put out of action by a mob that burned the building and smashed the presses. Employees of the paper fought with the crowd and six persons were killed and several wounded.

President Grau announced that he purposes to hold onto his office until May 20 next and will then give his resignation to a constituent assembly which will provide for the election of a constitutional president.

At the Pan-American conference in Montevideo Angel Giraudy, Cuban minister of labor, attacked the Cuban policy of the United States. Failure to recognize the Grau regime, he asserted, was actually intervention, since it was upholding a minority group against the wishes of the people and propagating revolution.

WHEN the day for war debt payments to the United States came around the expected happened. France, Poland, Belgium, Hungary and Estonia made no payments whatever. Finland, as it did last June, paid in full—$229,623. Token payments were made by five nations as follows:

Great Britain, $7,500,000 of $117,670,765; Italy, $1,000,000 to $2,133,906; Czechoslovakia, $150,000 of $1,682,813; Lithuania, $10,000 of $105,474, and Latvia, $8,500 of $180,706.

So in all, Uncle Sam received $8,808,123, or approximately one-seventeenth of the $152,952,637 due that day from eleven European nations. There is now $301,778,747 overdue on the $11,000,000,000 funded debts.

ONE foreign nation has undertaken to bring suit against a state of the Union before the Supreme Court of the United States—the first instance of the kind in history. The principality of Monaco seeks, through its American attorneys, permission to sue the state of Mississippi for payment of principal and interest on $100,000 worth of bonds defaulted in 1841. It was explained by the Monagesque consulate in New York that Monaco is empowered as a sovereign state to sue one of the United States, a privilege not accorded to individuals, and that the bonds were given the principality by three descendants of original investors, who had finally been convinced that, so far as private holders were concerned, the delta state was going to continue too proud to pay.

THE government of Greece notified Samuel Insull that he would have to leave that country when his residence permit expired on December 31, but when the American fugitive pleaded illness he was granted an extension of the permit to January 31. Insull has no consular status as an American citizen, his passport having been revoked. Where he can go with safety is a puzzle, for the United States has extradition treaties with all countries bordering on Greece and presumably he would be nabbed as soon as he entered any of them.

The government in Washington has instituted proceedings to collect from Insull, his wife and his son $221,000 in income taxes.

ALEJANDRO LERROUX is premier of Spain again, having succeeded Diego Martinez Barrios, who was made vice president of the new cabinet and minister of war. Lerroux said he was "pleased" with the ministry he had got together and that its formation of members of the left, the right and the center parties was compatible with the complexion of the new parliament, which is dominated by conservatives.

TOM HEFLIN of Alabama, who, used to entertain the senate and the country with his long diatribes against those who, he alleged, were persecuting him on religious grounds, plans a come-back to Washington in the capacity of a member of the lower house. He was beaten for the senate in 1930 by John A. Bankhead and was virtually read out of the Democratic party the year before by the state executive committee because he took the stump against Alfred E. Smith in 1928. Now Tom announces that he is a primary candidate for congressman from the Fifth district because he thinks the Democratic party is weak in debating ability. He says he will "help the President to obtain legislation that will take the control of the money supply out of the hands of those who produce panics every ten or twelve years."

Thomas Heflin

Mr. Heflin is concededly an able debater, but he may find the lower house less patient with his lengthy speeches concerning himself and his persecution complex than was the senate.

TWO of America's most popular and widely read novelists died on the same day in New York. Louis Joseph Vance, author of many tales of mystery, was found dead in a blazing arm chair in his apartment, the fire having apparently been set by a dropped cigarette. Robert W. Chambers, writer of best sellers for nearly forty years and noted especially for his novels of American history, passed away after an operation for an intestinal disorder.

COLONEL AND MRS. LINDBERGH ended their long flying tour of foreign lands when they arrived at Miami, Fla., from the Dominican republic. They took off soon after for New York. Their trip took them twice across the Atlantic ocean, and to four continents and thirty nations.

DOWN in Montevideo the Pan-American conference was talking about ways of ending the Chaco war between Bolivia and Paraguay, without getting anywhere. Meanwhile the forces of those countries were exceedingly busy in the jungle, with the result that the Paraguayans captured more than 13,000 Bolivian troops, with most of their officers. In one engagement more than 000 Bolivians were killed, according to the official announcement. There was great rejoicing in Asuncion, where the Paraguayans marched through decorated streets; and corresponding despair in La Paz, the Bolivian capital.

A few days later the Paraguayans captured Fort Saavedra, the most important Bolivian stronghold in the Chaco, and it was generally believed that these victories meant the final defeat of Bolivia in the war.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette. Two Frenchmen, the comte De Corlay and his son Robert, claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A French sailor, Sebastien, also knows of the treasure, and is seeking it. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, which is not where it had been supposed, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay warns Tom that Sebastien is clever and unscrupulous. They reach an understanding to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered. Doctor White makes arrangements for a professional diver to go down to the hulk of the Fourquet next day.

"He smelled the fog and wouldn't risk crossing Muscongus bay and rounding Pemaquid point in it," said the doctor. "I shouldn't care to wander through that rock pasture myself when the weather's so thick that you can eat it with a spoon."

"All the more reason for my going down, Gardy," said Jessica, sipping hot coffee and nibbling at a ship's biscuit.

"It's too bitter cold, Jessica. Wait until this afternoon. It may clear and come off warm."

"That's not going to change the temperature of the water. I'm warm now, and I sha'n't stay in long enough to get chilled. Come on, let's go, before Aunt Martha's subconscious self sets off the alarm clock."

She went out and down the steps, the doctor following reluctantly and growlingly.

Jessica stepped into a rowboat and picked up the oars, sensible procedure before an icy plunge. The doctor had provided a coil of light line and a mooring buoy. The tide was almost at the last of the ebb, with scarcely any current. Jessica, following the rough outline of the shore, pulled vigorously around to the corner of the island from which the Corvette ledge put out, when getting a bearing over the stern of the boat she rowed out into the fog, now whitening as the growing day illumined it.

CHAPTER VI

The water was still and clear, not transparent as in the tropics, but making it possible to see the weed on the rocky bottom at a depth of about fifteen feet. Then suddenly they found themselves over a great mass of the skate-shaped algae that Jessica had mentioned. This will float when detached, and the current having now stopped running, the big flat rubbery elephant ears were spread out just beneath the surface. Anchored by the tips of their long, tenuous tails, these sleek brown spatulate fronds were swinging and swaying with undulations of their lateral flukes, scalloped along the edges and seeming to be possessed of a crawling movement.

There were always vagrant eddies over the reef and the stirring of them now set the units of this mass of vegetation to oscillating in different directions, so that the whole, as one looked down upon it, suggested nothing so much as a mammoth school of stingarees nosing about in quest of bait.

"Here we are," said Jessica eagerly. "The roots of this kelp are on the wreck."

"Beastly stuff to dive through, Jessica."

"There's no harm in it, Gardy. Can't foul you up, because it tears like wet blotting paper. But it is going to be pretty dark down there."

"Oh, let it wait for another time, Jessica."

"No, I'm in a lovely glow and I'd rather have a plunge than not. Let's have your electric torch, Gardy. It will keep going as long as I care to. The trouble is going to be finding something about the corvette to catch a turn on."

Doctor White handed her the torch, with a wad of cotton into which he had worked vaseline. "Plug your ears and nostrils, Jessica. Don't take a chance with earache a few days later."

"All right. The pearl divers use wax, you know, but this ought to answer. We are directly over the wreck, I think. This little patch of kelp lifts up from it. Wet the line, Gardy, so there will be no tug on it."

Doctor White picked up the coil of new flag halliard stuff and soused it overboard. Jessica stood up, slipped off her long woolen gown and taking the end of the line, threw a loose bowline hitch in it and slipped her gleaming arm through the bight.

"Well, here goes, Gardy—" She fixed the rim of her rubber bathing cap securely under her ears and took a few deep, rapid inspirations, the more thoroughly to oxygenate her blood. Then, filling her lungs moderately, she kissed her hand to the anxious doctor and went down head first, like the sea otter that her supple body suggested, and leaving no more of a commotion where the brine enveloped her.

Doctor White leaned over the gunwale of the boat, paying out the line and trying vainly to follow with his vision the downward course of the white limbs. The kelp fronds stirred and eddied and spread out to curtain what was underneath them. The snaky coils of the line straightened like a circular spring stretched out. A few bubbles came gyrating upward.

Then all at once there was a startling illumination down there below, a bright blur of light that moved along in a curve with wavy punctuation from each stroke of the arm that was holding the torch. The effect of it was weird, yet extremely reassuring to the doctor, because it signaled the vigorous movements of the diver.

Doctor White could see the dark mass that was described by this radiance, but the abundant growth of submarine vegetation masked its character. At the end of fifty seconds that seemed like as many minutes, the doctor was about to give an admonitory tug on the line, when the light was quenched suddenly. At the same instant he discovered Jessica coming up with speed.

She bobbed out of the water bosom high, expelled the exhausted air from her lungs, refreshed them with a gasp or two, then laughed. But even in his relief at her reappearance Doctor White observed that she was clear of the line, and that its trend was downward at an angle.

"Are you all right, Jessica?" he asked.

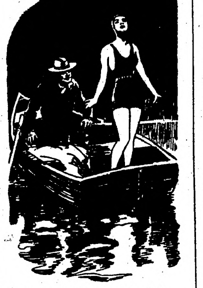
She nodded.

"Then climb aboard and put on your wrapper, before you catch cold."

"Let me get my breath. I'm catching gold."

"The deuce you are! Is the line fast?"

"All fast, sir. I landed on a ragged hole about the size of your head near the garboard strake. Where she plumped down on a sharp rock, I should say. The swell must have bumped her up and down on it along the length of her. She seemed all gouged and stove in abaft it. I caught the bight of the line around what seemed to be a shattered butt. It ought to hold, I think."



"Well, Here Goes, Gardy."

"You certainly are a living wonder, Jessica."

"Nothing hard about it. I never noticed the cold." She slanted her head. "Listen—there's a boat."

"Oh, never mind the boat. They're passing all the time. Climb in."

The doctor dropped down on a thwart, shoving himself against the other side to balance her. Jessica, with a downward thrust of her strong round arms, raised herself across the gunwale and backward to the thwart, then swung her legs in after her. Then all at once she seemed to petrify, staring into the gray fog that had thinned a bit.

"Look, Gardy!" she gasped in unmistakable alarm, paling visibly.

Doctor White glanced over his shoulder, vexedly. This would be the diver from Friendship, who had preferred to wait for daylight before starting round Pemaquid point. The doctor wished that the man had come a little earlier or a little later. It annoyed him to be found apparently in the act of employing his beautiful ward, Capt. Warren Poole's daughter, as one might make use of a Kanaka pearl diver.

Doctor White was annoyed at the interruption. But as his experienced eye swept over the details of the boat assembling out of the fog, this momentary vexation gave place to astonished chagrin, to dismay. Here was not their belated diver, nor even the De Corlays, nor Tom. It was a heavy yawl-rigged semi-cabin cruiser. As it forged slowly down on them, swinging off a little, the doctor discovered a small French flag flying from the mizzen truck.

The significance of this was very evident. No boat hailing from a neighboring French possession, especially Miquelon island, of which the commerce now deeply interested the United States revenue service, was going to advertise her nationality unless she felt herself to be a virtuous craft and entitled to the protection of her flag. This could be no other than that Sebastien, described as a scoundrel by Jessica and Robert, and now come to have a go at the Fourquet!

HAVE NO PROOF OF "FIRST MAN"

Nothing Positive as Yet in Scientific Research.

Sir Arthur Smith Woodward, who expressed to the geological congress in Washington his conviction that man originated in Africa, is one of the foremost students of human evolution in the world, but his argument seems to leave the question about where it was before. Man may have originated in Africa, or in Asia, or almost anywhere else on earth except, perhaps, in the Arctic or in America. It still is anybody's guess. Arguers first must agree, of course, about just what constitutes the origin of man. For Sir Arthur this is the origin of the species called Homo sapiens and including all existing races, other former species such as the Neanderthal being deemed extinct. Some time and somewhere this modern, sapient species of the genus Homo must have originated out of other forms. One of the handicaps of evolutionists always has been that no one has even one scrap of definite knowledge about where or when this was.

Sir Arthur's new evidence favoring an African locality consists chiefly of the remarkable discoveries made in East Africa by Dr. L. S. B. Leakey. Details of these discoveries are clearly of the highest importance. It is merely the argument deduced from them which is weak. Indubitable remains of Homo sapiens have been found by Doctor Leakey mixed with equally indubitable remains of animals well known from fossils but now totally extinct. It has been the conventional opinion of geologists that these animals have been extinct for a very long time. Accordingly, Doctor Leakey's finds suggest that Homo sapiens also is an ancient animal in Africa and may well have begun there. The weakness is the assumption that the extinct animals responsible for the dating are necessarily ancient. Instead, they may have lived on in Africa much longer than conventional opinion admits.

The final answer can come only from further spadework on both African and Asian deposits. The interior of China being closed for the moment by prejudice against foreign scientists and by lack of Chinese ones, the Asian opportunity seems to be tendered to Russia. As is natural when newcomers are enthroned, the scientific work of the Soviets so far seems to have been characterized more by enthusiasm than by competence, but enthusiasm happens to be the chief requisite for hunters of human fossils. It is to be hoped that the authorities in Moscow will not overlook the fact that another really significant discovery of human ancestors, such as those of Doctor Leakey in Africa or that of the Java ape-man a generation ago, would go far toward the goal of international recognition and respect which Soviet science obviously seeks.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

Latest News of the Work of the State Legislature Condensed for the Busy Reader

St. Paul—Ensembled in a tangle of legislation for establishment of a state liquor control system, the state legislature wound up the third week of its existence by accomplishing nothing and going home for a three-day Christmas holiday.

Both houses were tied in a knot on the liquor problem. Each had its own ideas of what control means. Neither sought the advice of the other, but proceeded along its own lines. The result was an ever-widening spread betwen the two branches that threatened to carry them in opposite directions. With two days of debate behind them, and no definite progress made on a liquor control measure as a whole, legislative leaders optimistically hoped for a conclusion to the task when they returned. Assurance was given that the legislature would be through with not only the liquor bills, but with relief and tax measures, besides a host of other legislation squeezed in by the first of the year. The pessimists, however, were not so sure that even a liquor measure would be out by then.

Governor Olson's $5,000,000 relief bill was approved by the house appropriations committee and supporters of the measure moved for suspension of the rules to steer it through to a successful passage. At the same time Attorney General Herry H. Peterson submitted a ruling that the measure was constitutional in an opinion, requested by the governor who asked whether his proposed bill violated article nine, section five of the state constitution which in part provides that the state shall not contract any debts for works of internal improvement or be a party in carrying on such works.

By a vote of 48 to 11 the state senate killed a proposal to increase the state tax on gasoline from three to four cents a gallon. By its action the senate apparently closed the doors to this issue during the remainder of the special session. The test came on a motion by Senator Henry Morin of Duluth to reject a rules committee recommendation that the bill providing for the gas tax increase be indefinitely postponed.

Two bills were killed by action of the senate rules committee. One would restore a law requiring that Minnesota products be given preference in the construction of public buildings, and the other was a resolution proposing to empower the governor to declare an embargo on shipments of agricultural products out of the state whenever prices became confiscatory.

Creation of a state board of housing, with the legislative machinery to permit organization of limited divident housing corporations as a relief measure, was proposed to the house by Representative J. R. Sweitzer, St. Paul. The proposed board of housing would consist of seven members, the board of control, the state auditor, state treasurer, and two persons to be appointed by the governor.

The powerful tax penalty plan, aimed primarily at the mine operators in northern Minnesota, was killed by the house committee on taxes. Drafted by Representative Charles Wangensteed, Chisholm, it would have imposed penalties ranging from five per cent for the first $1,000 delinquent tax more than $500 up to 30 per cent when the delinquency amounted to more than $200,000. A one per cent monthly penalty also was added.

Proposed erection of a Minnesota psychopathic hospital was given renewed impetus with introduction in the state house of a bill providing for construction of the $350,000 building with state and federal funds.

The house committee on emergency relief approved the joint resolution by Otto Goetsch and others, asking congress to restrict imports of dairy products and oils, canned meats and foreign starches.

The tax increase on fire insurance premiums was approved by the house committee on cities. The present tax of 2 per cent would be doubled, as urged by Governor Olson, to help out the depleted firemen's pension funds.

An increase of approximately one-third in the motor vehicle license fees, to give the state highway department an additional $1,750,000 to $2,000,000, is proposed in a bill given to the house by Representative E. J. Chilgren of International Falls.

Governor Olson urged the senate to pass the weighing and grading bill under which state weighers and graders would be established at concentration points in the state for livestock which must pass through those centers before reaching the central market.

Lunch for the School Child

Bulletin Recently Published by the Bureau of Home Economics in Washington Offers Some Valuable Suggestions.

Mothers almost at their wits' end struggling with the problem of devising and preparing nutritious and attractive food for the younger members of the family will be interested in the following comment and advice:

"The nutrition column has received several letters in the past few weeks in regard to the problem of luncheon for school children. As soon as little children begin to leave the constant care of the home, adjustments must be made in the plan which has been developed and followed since infancy.

"School days begin early for some children these days, as the nursery schools take children from two years on. These are becoming increasingly popular, especially for the mothers who do work outside their own homes. Day nurseries which care for children of working mothers have been in existence for a long time, but it is only within the past few years that new educational methods for good training in all habits include that of eating wisely.

"The nursery school—so called—in its highest development may be seen at Teachers' college, Columbia university, where teachers are trained especially for this work. Children in these schools stay for the greater part of the day.

"Even when kindergarten and primary school children go home for lunch, mothers often find that the change from home routine creates some meal problem. I should like to recommend to all mothers a bulletin prepared by Mary E. Sweeney, assistant director, Merrill - Palmer school, and Charlotte Chatfield, specialist in food and nutrition, bureau of home economics, Washington, published by the United States Department of Agriculture as circular 203. The title of this is 'Midday Meals for Preschool Children in Day Nurseries and Nursery Schools,' and this bulletin is the product of the experience of the Merrill-Palmer school, which has been the pioneer in this work. While this material has been developed scientifically, all mothers will find here material for study and for application. The modern mother is always looking for help of this sort. The portion on menu planning, while it has been developed particularly for the needs of young children, in principle applies to the feeding problem of all children. I quote a portion of this for your consideration:

"'The nutritive value of the food is not the only consideration in feeding the young child. His appetite or desire to eat, which is affected by many factors, internal and external, has an important bearing on his food intake. In order to attach pleasant memories to food, all associations during the meal hour should be attractive in flavor, color, odor and texture. Careful preparation and attractive service contribute also to the esthetic appeal of food. Serving food that is burned, undercooked, lumpy or too hot may take away the appetite and give rise to a prejudice that it requires months of re-education to overcome.

"'A diet containing the right proportions of the different nutrients tends to promote a good appetite. A specific influence on the appetite seems to come from vitamin B. Small portions of food and an opportuunity for second servings, inspire a much greater desire to eat than large portions. Small servings also help the child form the habit of finishing what is placed on his plate. Appetite is stimulated physiologically by hunger contractions in the empty stomach. A regime that places meals far enough apart and reduces or eliminates the practice of eating between meals allows normal hunger to develop and stimulates the desire for food.

"'The physical and emotional condition of the child plays an important role. The healthy, active, well-nourished child usually has at mealtime a noticeable eagerness for food that is often absent in the child who is physically below par. Frequent colds, ear troubles and other infections, all seem to affect the appetite. In a healthy child a sudden lack of interest in food may be a sign of approaching illness or fatigue. Children who are fatigued from overstrenuous play, excitement or insufficient sleep may show a disinterest in, or even an active distaste for food. Their desire to eat is usually restored by a short rest just before mealtime. Emotional upsets from fear, anger or disappointment, if experienced near the meal hour, also affect the appetite. Urging children to eat a full meal under any of these conditions is not advisable. It is better for them to eat nothing or to eat lightly, and to rest quietly until the next meal. If poor appetite becomes chronic, the advice of a physician should be sought. The child whose mealtimes have always been treated without stress or apparent concern is not likely to develop faulty food habits. Wholesome food properly prepared and given to the child without special comment is usually eaten as a matter of course.'"

To Give Color to Bridge Menus

Calla Lily Dessert and Salads Will Set Off Any Table.

Every hostess hopes to serve something distinctive when she entertains her bridge club, mother's club, to which she belongs, the social which meets at members' houses, etc. The ideas given here have this merit. They are dishes easy to prepare, inexpensive to make, and delightfully pictorial to set before guests.

For carrot trumpet flowers, select as many large carrots as there are persons to serve. Scrape and parboil. Remove from kettle, cut off end of each, leaving the large part three inches or more in length. With an apple corer or sharp knife, scoop out center for two inches or more, according to length of carrot, leaving rim about three-eighths of an inch wide indented to indicate petals. Place these partly made flowers carefully in a steamer, and finish cooking by steam. When tender, but not soft enough to break, lift out with fork and spoon and, when cold, lay on sprigs of watercress for foliage.

Minced salad mayonnaise is always good. Into hollow centers gently press minced salad mayonnaise. This is made by chopping celery, apples, nuts, green sweet pepper, and, if wanted, a little chicken, or veal, and mixing well with mayonnaise to which as been added one drop of burnt onion juice to each level tablespoonful of mayonnaise.

On the watercress foliage put a slender strip of cucumber pickle each side a trumpet flower. Serve buttered brown bread sandwiches separately, or two-finger sandwich strips on the plate with each trumpet flower salad. The brown of the sandwich harmonizes attractively with the green of the watercress and the rich yellow of the carrot.

Calla lilies can be made from fresh ripe pears or from canned pears. If from ripe ones, core and cut a V-shaped piece from one side near the blossom end. With a sharp knife shape the pear to simulate a calla lily. It should have a definite top just back of the V. Down hollow center thrust a segment of orange for a pistil. Lay each lily on an endive leaf spread with green mayonnaise, or green lettuce leaves can be used and yellow mayonnaise be served on the side. Garnish with candied orange peel.

When canned pears are used, lay one half carefully on a lettuce leaf and fill center with orange jelly. Over this put another half pear, and carefully cut a V-shaped piece from near stem end to widen at blossom end. The yellow jelly simulates the pistil. A spoonful of white or green-colored whipped cream is put each side of the lily. Pear calla lilies are suggested for desserts as well as for refreshments.

Rejuvenation Impossible

Rejuvenation of humans through gland therapy is impossible, at least for the present, according to Dr. David Klein of Chicago, who recently told the American Chemical society that the failures of experiments in this direction have been "one of the many disappointments to fall to the lot of those working with the endocrines."

COLONIAL DAYS TO LIVE AGAIN

Glory of Old Williamsburg Being Revived.

In a few days a strange thing will be seen in the old part of Williamsburg, Va.—the tearing up of modern streets in order to replace their surfaces with flag and cobblestones. Already many of the buildings of the Colonial period have been reconstructed and tourists will soon have the opportunity of seeing the Williamsburg of pre-Revolutionary times. It is still a little place of about 3,000 inhabitants, its chief distinction the College of William and Mary. The idea of restoring the Colonial part of Williamsburg must be credited to Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, one of its professors. When he was made an honorary member of the American Institute of Architects a citation said: "He has made architecture, history and archeology in America his eternal debtors. Without his vision, his courage and his energy, the restoration of Williamsburg would never have occurred." At the same time John D. Rockefeller, Jr., was similarly honored by the institute, and he authorized Doctor Goodwin to purchase Colonial buildings in Williamsburg in his own name. He spent $1,850,000 in acquiring properties needed. For 18 months he kept the secret. At a mass meeting of citizens to vote upon the enterprise he was obliged to name his chief patron.

At the University club of Baltimore Doctor Goodwin told the whole story. Henry Ford had been asked to finance the reconstruction, but declined. An address by Doctor Goodwin before the Phi Beta Kappa society in New York interested Mr. Rockefeller; the two men were introduced, and the restoration of Colonial Williamsburg was then and there made possible. Many Colonial memories cluster about Williamsburg. Bruton Parish church was built in 1717. From the powder magazine (1714) Lord Dunmore removed the munitions after the Battle of Lexington. Williamsburg was the capital of the province when Patrick Henry made his deathless speech against the stamp act, on May 30, 1765. Washington's headquarters were in the George Wythe house during the siege of Yorktown. The Virginia Gazette was established there in 1736. A hundred years before the Revolution Nathaniel Bacon held his "rebel" assembly at Middle Plantation, by which name Williamsburg was formerly known. More than a year ago the recreated Raleigh tavern, where royal governors danced and patriots met to conspire, was opened as an exhibition building. Colonial Williamsburg when fully restored will be a museum a few miles square.—New York Times.

BIG FACTOR IN CURE IS TRAVEL TO ATTAIN IT

I am not denying virtue to the European thermal springs. I believe that they have it. Anyhow, the foreign cure almost invariably is based on it. It may take the form of mud packs, as in Czecho-Slovakia; the water may and does vary in temperature and in its very mild chemical constituency. But the European cure remains largely a water cure, supplemented by diet, rest and exercise.

That these cures are effective is shown by the almost incredible number of people, Europeans, British and American, with whom the visit to this spa or that bad is an annual affair. They go back year after year for their cure. Just how many of them could find precisely the same thing at home is a controversial matter. It is my own belief that all of them probably could, but that very often a part of the cure is this very matter of escape from home.

But one outstanding fact became more and more evident to us as time went on. The people who received most benefit were not the actively ill, but the ones who needed reconditioning. For this purpose, and for the ailments which lack of condition always implies, foreign cure is admirable.

Not because practically the same thing could not be taken at home. America at least has a wealth of thermal springs. But because it would not be taken. The man who has crossed 3,000 miles of ocean in search of improvement is likely to do all he can to secure it.—Mary Roberts Rinehart in the Saturday Evening Post.

Better Breakfasts

WHAT! No bacon nor eggs? Well, do we always have to serve bacon or eggs for breakfast? If you belong to the followers of the better breakfast campaign, you will enjoy one breakfast a week that omits these two favorites, providing it affords something else very good and different.

Vary Your Menus

Winter appetites demand variety in foods, more baked dishes and sustaining menus. Try baked fruits for a change, and hot breakfast cakes are also delicious.

The following menu suggests a different way with breakfast fruit, an innovation in cereal, and a very delicious breakfast cake instead of toast. Try it.

What-To-Do For Fall Parties

IF your fall parties don't turn out to be a grand time for all, it isn't the fault of the shops this season. There's everything new to do, new to eat, new to drink and new ways to eat and drink them. Going through the game departments of the larger stores is more fun than a country fair—what with things to shoot, balls to roll, punch games and dice games. And even perennial bridge has new devices that all but play the game for you.

Jolly Games

Among the new games to be recommended are "Balaroo," with a spin-the-top center and ping-pong ball attachments, a new anagram game that is lively and amusing and known as "Scrambles," Eddie Cantor's deal-the-card game called "Tell It to the Judge," and another game called "Sorry" which anyone would be glad to play. Backgammon is still holding its own and comes in any kind of form you want, from the ten-cent store edition to a handsome tooled-leather set. And there are also old-fashioned parchesi sets—the kind you played on when you were a youngster—and Club Parchesi which has a board similar to a Cribbage board.

Cocktail napkins continue to be amusing. One pale green linen set has a different player in a jazz band on each napkin, while another, which comes in various colors, lists the name of a different drink in the corner of each. The new plaid gingham sets come in most cheerful colors and are very inexpensive.

You will want a list of smart new foods to serve at your very new fall parties—canapés, salads, desserts and candies. Here are some tested recipes that you will like and which your guests will remember:

Jolly Good Food

Manhattan Canapés: Toast or fry rounds of bread, then spread with anchovy paste. Cut slices of ripe tomato one-half inch thick, having the bread slightly larger in diameter. Remove seeds from the tomatoes, leaving four cavities in each slice. Place the tomato on toast and fill one cavity with seasoned caviar, the next with chopped chutney, the third with pickled onions and the last with sliced artichoke hearts. Pipe around the tomato, on the edge of the toast, a narrow band of green mayonnaise.

Shrimps Mouquin: Cook one-half cup of whole blanched almonds in one and one-half tablespoons butter very gently until a golden yellow. Add three-fourths cup celery cut in one-half inch pieces, and cook again until the celery is tender and the nuts and celery are a golden brown. Add shrimps cut in halves from a 5¾-ounce can, and cook two minutes longer. Add one-third cup cream, season to taste with salt and serve on hot fingers of toast.

Stuffed Pimola Entrée: Smooth one teaspoon flour with one-half cup cream, and bring to boiling. Add the contents of a small can of deviled ham, and stir until smooth. Wrap a piece of bacon around each of five large pimolas, and fasten with a toothpick. Fry in deep fat. Pour the deviled ham sauce on five rounds of toast and place a pimola in its bacon covering on each one.

Pineapple and Cherry Salad: Cut pineapple slices from a No. 2½ size can in halves, and place two halves on crisp lettuce leaves, with the round edges of the pineapple touching in the center. Stone two cups of ripe black cherries (or use canned pitted black cherries), and stuff with cream cheese and put an almond in each. Place on two sides of the salad, and make rosettes of mayonnaise on the other two sides.

Snowball Cakes: Cream together one-half cup butter and one and three-quarters cups sugar, add one cup diluted evaporated milk alternately with two and one-fourth cups cake flour which has been sifted with three teaspoons baking powder. Add one teaspoon almond flavoring, and fold in carefully five beaten egg whites. Bake a small amount in small muffin tins or round bottomed custard or jelly molds. Have the oven 375 degrees for about twenty minutes. Cool, cut a thin slice off the top of each cake to give a flat surface, spread with strawberry, or some other jam, and press two cakes together. Then ice the entire cake with boiled icing or with melted fondant. If you like, roll in coconnut.

Hawaiian Fudge: Boil to 238 degrees two cups sugar, one-half cup cream, one-half cup crushed pineapple and one tablespoon butter. Tint a pale green, cool and beat until creamy. Add one-fourth cup chopped nuts, pour into a buttered pan. Cut in squares.*

Central Cooperative Members To Get $149,000 Refund

Farmer stockholders in the Central Co-Operative Association will receive a refund of $149 000.00, the largest ever paid by the organization during the twelve years of its existence. That organization is a farmer-owned livestock selling agency operating on an actual cost basis, and the $149,000.00 refund to be paid back for farmers on a patronage basis is equivalent to 35 percent of commissions collected in addition to 8 percent interest on capital stock outstanding.

This was announced at a meeting of the board of directors last week. The board consists of C. B. Crandall, President of Randolph, Minn.; R. G. Von Toble, First Vice President, Verdon, South, Dakota; H. L. Halvorson, Second Vice President, Litchfield, Minn.; R. K. Keeler, Treasurer, Chokio, Minn.; S. S. Beach, Hutchinson, Minn.; N. J. Nelson, Oaks, North Dakota; J. E. Bowen, Barron, Wis.: and J. B. Jones, Lake Crystal, Minn.

Last year the Directors declared a dividend and refund amounting to $139,391.17. In 1931 this refund was $120,265.79 and in 1930 it was $103,602.72.

Since 1921, the year the Central Co-Operative Association began doing business at South Saint Paul, farmers of the Northwest have saved approximately $2,650,000.00 by patronizing it.

The office force of the Central Co-Operative Association is working over time making out patronage refund checks. This work will continue for a month or so, before the checks will be ready to be mailed, but it is expected that the job will be finished at least by the time the Central holds its annual meeting February 13 and 14.

I am confident that organized safety work will be more necessary than ever during the next few years. We must not be caught unprepared when the demand for production is heard again.

Industry must guard its employes when this production and work begins- Safety and production go hand in hand.

Our streets and highway will be busier than ever and crowded with vehicles capable of even greater speed than most of those now operating. In every line of human activity there will be increased opportunities for the safety movement.

We must be prepared. We can all help.

Tax Rates In The County Show Varied Changes

In spite of a substantial increase in state and county tax rates, more than half of Marshall county villages, townships and school districts reduced their tax rate levy for 1933, according to a compilation of tax rates compiled recently in the office of Levi G. Johnson, county auditor.

The state tax rate for this year totaled 11.06 mills compared to 8.25 mills of the previous year, or an increase of 2.81 mills. The county rate for this year increased from 18.25 mills to 24.34 mills.

For the year 1934, 78 school districts and 11 townships and villages of the county, will have their tax rates increased, while in 58 school districts and 49 townships and villages the rates will be decreased, a comparison of 1932 and 1933 tax rates show. During 1934 there will be 26 school districts with the same tax rate and none of the townships and villages will have their rate changed.

The village of Holt again shows the highest tax rate for 1934 with a total of 238.5 mills, for school, village, county, and state purposes. This figure is an increase of 5 mills over last year's rate, which was among the highest in the state of Minnesota. However, the assessed valuation in the Holt district is comparatively low, consequently the rates show an increase. This rate of 238.5 mills, includes 35.4 mills for county and state purposes, 61.2 mills for the village of Holt, and 141.9 mills for the school district.

The lowest tax rate for the villages will be found in the village of Viking, where the total rate amounts to 77.8 mills, which is an increase of 8.6 mills over the previous year. This rate includes 35.4 for county and state purposes, 11.6 for the village and 30.8 mills for the school district.

The total rate of Stephen will be 101.1 mills, of which 35.4 mills is for the state and county, 24.6 mills is for the village of Stephen, and 41.1 mills is for the school district. The Alvarado rate of 120.7 mills is divided 35.4 mills for the county and state purposes, 20.7 mills for the village and 53.7 mills for the school district. The Argyle rate totals 130.6 mills, including 35.4 mills for the county and state, 51.7 mills for township and village, and 43.5 mills for school district. Grygla will have a total rate of 87.2 mills, of which 25 mills is for the village, 26.8 mills for the school district and 35.4 mills for state and county purposes.

In Newfolden the total rate is 161.3 mills, of which 22.7 mills is for the village, 63.7 mills for the school district, and 35.4 mills for county and state. Strandquist's rate of 136 mills is split 17.1 mills for the village, 84.5 mills for the school district, and 35.4 mills for state and county. In Middle River the tax rate is 161.3 mills, of which 34.2 mills is for the village, 91.7 mills for the school district and 35.4 mills for county and state.

The rate in Oslo will be 175.3 mills, with 113.8 mills going for the school district, 26 mills for the village and 35.4 mills for the state and county.

The 1933 tax rate for Warren will total 109.2 mills, of which 20.1 mills is for operation of the city and 53.7 mills for the operation of the school district. Of all the villages mentioned, only Stephen, Strandquist, and Middle River have a lower rate than the previous year.

The townships and villages having increase in tax rates are: Bloomer, Boxville, Moose River, Oak Park, Sinnot, Tamarac, village of Argyle, village of Holt, village of Oslo, village of Viking and the city of Warren.——Warren Sheaf.

I. M. Marshall In Charge Of County Transient Bureau

Transient homeless people in Minnesoto will be cared for by the newly-created stade-wide transient relief organization, divisions of which are operating in each county, according to Oscar W. Behrens, State Director of the experimental program.

Irvin M. Marshall has been placed in charge of the local registration bureau at Warren in Marshall County. This office will register all needy individuals and families falling in the categories of transient or state and resident homeless.

Provisions for care of the former group have been made by the new organizations, while the others will be provided for thru already established channels.

Homeless men will be given the oportunity of entering work camps operating in the state. They will be completely outfitted and be expected to work 36 hours weekly for maintenance. In addition, they will be able to earn 90 cents each week in cash for incidental expenses such as tobacco and other luxuries. No man will be permitted to work more than 48 hours weekly.

Following are camps now operating: Mendota, Fort Snelling reservation near St. Paul, capacity 1200 men; Medecine Lake 19 miles northwest of Minneapolis, 1000 men; Whitewater Park 25 miles east of Rochester, 60 men; Independence 35 miles west of Duluth, 150 men; Savannah Forest 13 miles north of McGregor, 200 men; Badoura, 10 miles south of Akeley, 40 men; Itasca Park 60 men; Pratt, 9 miles southwest of Ray 150 men; and Elbow Lake, 20 miles east of Waubun, 100 men.

These camps will have combined capacity of 2960 men. An additional 855 men can be accommodated in nine other camps which will be opened as needed.

Camps will be operated by a camp superintendent and cook, and will be maintained on a self-governing basis. The men will be employed in conservation, land clearing and other projects on public lands.

Starting January 1, railroads are to start a campaign against transients "buming" rides from one town to another on freight cars. In addition, a drive against hitch-hiking and a new method of coping with pan-handlers is to be started.

To relieve distress, thousands of small coupon booklets are being distributed to housewives and businessmen, the booklets containing referrel tickets which the transients may bring to the local registration bureau and recieve such aid and service as needed. Every resident of the state is asked to cooperate in this compaign, using the coupon rather than giving cash or food, in an effort to aid the needy transient and eliminate the perpetual beggar.

In addition to Mr. Behrens, the state staff includes Miss Rose Seiler, case supervisor; George A. Ginzel, camp supervisor, and Sam L. Leviton, superintendent of registration.

State Highway Department Combats Icy Roads

More than forty million pounds of sand and cinders is being used by the State Highway department this winter in making icy roads safer for traffic, according to a department bulletin.

This has been an unusually bad winter for slippery roads in many parts of the state, and the maintance division of the highway department has done more than the ordinary amount of sanding. Hills and curves on hard-surfaced highways have received the greatest attention.

The department has purchased so far this year 184 tons of calcium chloride which is mixed with the sand and tends to hold it on the ice instead of being carried off by traffic.

Ole Bergman Is Chairman Of County Board For 1934

Ole Bergman, Alvarado, second district representative on the Marshall County Board of Commissioners, was chosen as chairman of the county board for 1934 at the annual meeting held at Warren last week. Mr Bergman succeeds J. J. Pagnac of Stephen who has served as chairman during the past year.

Otto J. Johnson, Grygla, commissioner from this district was named vice-chairman for the year.

The Warren Sheaf was again designated as the official newspaper for Marshall county during 1934 and as such will publish the proceedings of the board, the delinquent tax lists, the financial statement and all official county legal notices. Because of a change in publication laws laws made by the state legislature last winter, it was required that the board designate an additional paper in the county to publish the Financial Statement. As a result of this law the Stephen Messenger was designated to make the second publication. However, through arrangements of the Marshall county newspapers, the Financial Statement, the delinquent tax list and the proceedings of the January and July meeting will be circulated in all of the Marshall county newspapers without additional cost to the taxpayers of the county.

Silver Remonetized by Order of the President—Recovery Program Developments—Huey Long's Income Tax Under Investigation.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

SILVER has come back. By executive order of President Roosevelt it is remonetized in the United States and will be coined on a large scale. Formally ratifying the London conference agreement and exercising the powers given him by the inflation amendment to the farm adjustment act, the President directed all the federal mints to accept for coinage all silver mined hereafter in the United States or its possessions, up to 24,000,000 ounces a year, at a price of 64½ cents an ounce. This is to be in force for four years.

Senator Pittman

The government split the present legal price of $1.29 an ounce for silver in half in reaching a purchase figure which is 19 cents an ounce over the present open market.

"This proclamation," the President wrote, "in accordance with the act of congress, opens our mints to the coinage of standard silver dollars from silver hereafter produced in the United States, or its possessions, subject to the depositors of such silver surrendering to the government one-half of it as seigniorage and to cover all usual charges and expenses. The dollar coined from half of such newly mined silver will be returned to the depositor. The half surrendered to the government will be retained by the treasury."

Mr. Roosevelt, in ratifying the agreement, pointed out that such action already has been taken by the government of India and that other nations concerned were ready also to act.

Most jubilant of all public men over the President's action was Senator Key Pittman of Nevada, who, as a delegate to the London conference, took a leading part in drawing up the silver agreement. He foresees greatly increased export business as a result of the move because the buying power of the silver-using countries of the Far East, especially China and India, is lifted by about 50 per cent.

Senator Pittman said the effect of the new order would be to take into the treasury about 24,000,000 ounces of silver, to coin one-half of it and deliver it to the owner or depositor of the silver. The other 50 per cent will be retained as bullion in the treasury. It is his expectation that the new order of the White House will give great encouragement to the silver mining regions of the West.

BOTH the federal Surplus Relief corporation and the agricultural adjustment administration have been purchasing commodities for the relief of the idle, and thereby economy and efficiency have suffered. Such purchasing operations have now been consolidated in the Surplus Relief corporation.

The administration also was completing plans for utilizing the Surplus Relief corporation as a device for retiring millions of acres of submarginal lands from cultivation. The work is being directed by Rexford G. Tugwell, assistant secretary of agriculture, and it is planned to use funds of the public works administration to purchase the economically unproductive areas.

ANOTHER development of the new deal in relation to farmers may be expected soon. Experts of the Agriculture department are working on the details of a huge federal corporation to finance renovation of farm homes on liberal credit terms. The civil works administration has undertaken a census of farm homes to find out what is needed. Loans are contemplated for the addition of rooms, and for the repair, replacement or installation of electric refrigeration, electric lights; and for new plumbing and landscaping. The government would buy the necessary materials and contract with private concerns for the work.

OFFICIALS of 21 railroad unions met in Chicago and adopted a program of desired legislation that includes a six-hour working day for the million or more railway workers in the country as a means of increasing employment.

A. F. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, who acted as chairman at the meeting, estimated that a six-hour day would cost the railroads of the country $300,000,000 annually. The railroads themselves have estimated the probable cost at twice that amount, he admitted.

The same weekly and monthly basic pay schedules are to be retained for the railway men under the program.

AFTER receiving a report from an investigating committee headed by Robert S. Lynd, the consumers' advisory board of the NRA recommended the establishment of a consumers' standards board that would be charged with the development of means of enforcing accurate labeling. Among the articles named as needing quality grading are gasoline, razor blades and children's shoes. Legitimate industry, in the opinion of the board, is encountering destructive competition from unethical producers who are reducing the quality of their products to fill the gap in their profits caused by enforcement of NRA wage and employment standards.

Administrator Hugh S. Johnson was busy trying to clear up the situation concerning the cleaners and dyers. Many in this industry had been cited for prosecution for refusing to comply with prescribed minimum prices. The cash-and-carry cleaners contended these prices were so high that their business would be ruined.

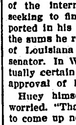
Johnson defended the prices prescribed as "reasonable and fair for the quality of cleaning which the public has the right to expect," but conceded that "there is some demand for lower quality or so-called scamped work."

"Accordingly," he continued, "cleaners who wish to maintain higher prices and higher standards, may join with the President to continue the minimum prices originally approved and such cleaners will be given the right to display the blue eagle with appropriate insignia yet to be decided on, indicating they are maintaining higher quality and higher prices."

WHEN President Roosevelt's pet project in the Tennessee valley is far enough advanced to manufacture electric power it is going to produce a lot of it, and consumers will be needed. So, to create a market for this energy the President has set up a million dollar mortgage loan corporation, using public works funds, and directed it to finance electric appliance purchases in the Tennessee region. Cheap credit will be extended to all home owners and residents within the Tennessee Valley Authority area for this purpose.

Manufacturers of electrical household goods are enthusiastic over the prospect of having the government furnish funds with which their products can be bought.

SENATOR HUEY P. LONG, the Louisiana "kingfish," may be nearing the end of his rope. The latest news about him is that the administration has decided upon his prosecution on the often heard charges of evasion of income taxes. When Mr. Hoover was President an investigation of his receipts, as well as those of his political associates in Louisiana, was started, and dropped probably because the Presidential election was near. Now this inquiry has been resumed, the agents of the internal revenue department seeking to find out whether Long reported in his income tax schedules all the sums he received both as governor of Louisiana and as United States senator. In Washington it is held virtually certain that this action has the approval of President Roosevelt.



Senator Long

Huey himself professes not to be worried. "That matter was scheduled to come up now," he said to an interviewer. "It has been up 750 times before, and always comes just before congress meets. I am not interested."

Long's power in his home state is fast waning. In the first place, he has been unable to obtain any recognition in the matter of federal patronage. And the senate committee's investigation of the election of Long's colleague, Senator Overton, uncovered a most unsavory mess, the odor of which offends Louisiana folk. Only a few days ago Mayor T. S. Walmsley of New Orleans announced that he had definitely broken with the "kingfish," and others of his prominent adherents have followed suit.

FRANCE'S worst railroad disaster made Christmas a time of mourning instead of joy there. One hundred and ninety men, women and children perished when the Paris-Strasbourg flyer crashed into the Nancy express at full speed at Pomponne, about 15 miles from Paris. The accident happened during a dense fog. In the number of dead this disaster was second only to one at Gretna Green, Scotland, in 1915, in which 227 persons were killed.

ROOSEVELT family customs were observed Christmas day in the White House. First thing in the morning "Sistie" and "Buzzie" Dall carried to their illustrious grandfather, as he lay abed, the stockings they had hung up the night before, so he could be the first to see the gifts Santa Claus had left. After breakfast a Christmas tree in the second floor corridor blazed in splendor—with wax tapers, not electric bulbs—and the real fun of the day began, with the children all the time the center of operations. As he does each year, Mr. Roosevelt read aloud Dickens' "Christmas Carol."

REPEAL of prohibition has by no means silenced the W. C. T. U. From its headquarters in Chicago comes this statement:

"The first fortnight of liquor's legal return in the 24 wet states includes some unnoted but nevertheless significant developments that thoughtful citizens can scarcely afford to ignore.

"The results may be epitomized as follows:

"1. For the first time in 14 years approximately 56,000,000 American citizens, including fathers and mothers, and nearly 15,000,000 young people, have been made the legal target of high pressure liquor salesmanship.

"2. In consequence thousands of American homes are suffering today from the direct results of the return of legalized liquor.

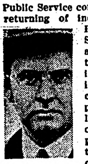
"3. Thousands of young people in these opening days of ratified repeal have taken the first serious step toward dissipation amid the flashing lure of the modernized barroom appeal.

"4. Thousands of men and women have returned to their business with judgment impaired, efficiency diminished, liability to accidents intensified, pockets depleted and nothing to show for it except a bad taste in the mouth and a memory of seared ideals.

"5 Millions of dollars have already since repeal been diverted from legitimate business and from the immediate tragic needs of charity and relief, to the till of the liquor seller and the cash drawer of the brewer and distiller."

For the present, however, this is as a voice crying in the wilderness.

GRAND jury investigation of the affairs of the Northern Indiana Public Service company resulted in the returning of indictments at Crown Point, Ind., against Samuel Insull, Jr., and other officials of the company, including Morse Dell Plain, its president. It is charged that the company's treasury was looted for the benefit of Insull holding companies. The report of the grand jury included these accusations:



Samuel Insull, Jr.

That a bookkeeping error of $10,000,000 was purposely made to deceive the Indiana public service commission and justify high rates for service.

That huge expense accounts for certain officials, covering trips to California and Atlantic City and the sending of vast quantities of flowers to hotels, were an unjustified charge against Northern Indiana Public Service.

That properties, in many instances worthless, and without exception worth far less than the value charged, were transferred to the treasury of Northern Indiana through a system of interlocking directorates. This was done, the report declared, to "milk Northern Indiana Public Service of surplus earnings."

That the funds and assets of the operating company are still being "constantly depleted by the domination of Midland Utilities and other parent organizations of the Insull group."

The investigation was given its start when Howard W. Duncan, former assistant treasurer of Northern Indiana, confessed he had embezzled $132,000 of the company's money and lost it on the race horses. Duncan pleaded guilty to the theft of $1,500. He offered to tell the inside story of the Insull high finance and was allowed to do so. The investigators then followed out the lines he laid down for them to follow.

PRESIDENT DE VALERA'S government in the Irish Free State sustained a severe reverse when Justice Byrne of the Dublin High court released on a writ of habeas corpus Gen. Owen O'Duffy and Capt. John Sullivan, leaders of the United Ireland party and the Blue Shirt movement. They had been arrested at Westport under the public safety act.

"We are teaching the government to respect the law," said General O'Duffy, as he left the prison. "The Blue Shirt movement is perfectly lawful and constitutional and will go on to victory. I don't anticipate there will be any more interference with Blue Shirts after the high court vindication. If there is, we are prepared to meet it. We will carry on until the objects which we established are achieved and until eventually, as I hope and believe, the Irish people entrust us with the government of this country."

PEACE, for the time being, has come to the Gran Chaco, for Paraguay and Bolivia agreed to a truce and their warfare in the jungle region was stopped. This was arranged by the League of Nations commission with the backing of the delegates to the Pan-American conference in Montevideo. Negotiations for a permanent settlement of the long conflict were proceeding in the Uruguayan capital. Secretary of State Hull was given much of the credit for the armistice.

UNDER the leadership of Captain Goering, Chancellor Hitler's right hand man and possible successor, the government of Prussia has promulgated six new laws that abolish voting in that state. The government is completely centralized and the leadership principle introduced into the smallest local units. An official statement said: "Liberalistic and democratic vestiges will be eradicated and supplanted by a strong and responsible leadership."

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of salvaging a long-sunken French corvette. The comte De Corlay and his son Robert claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A sailor, Sebastien, also is seeking the treasure. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay and Tom agree to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered. Doctor White arranges for a professional diver to go down to the hulk of the Fourquet. Next morning, the diver having failed to appear, Jessica dives and attaches a line to the Fourquet. Then Sebastien, with two companions, arrives.

In the shock of this forbidding complication Jessica sat and stared at the boat as it drifted slowly up to them. Three men were in her cockpit, one of them holding the heavy, old-fashioned tiller. This would be Sebastien, the doctor thought, his fists clinching, and the fellow looked indeed the sort that the girl and Robert had described. In a day when pirates still are quoted at par Sebastien had all the visible traits of high efficiency.

His face looked intelligent and alert, less stealthy than scheming, and merciless rather than of the type that goes with slinking treachery. There was a sort of Tartar suggestion about the wide cheekbones, hooked nose, square angled jaw and narrow, pointed chin. His black, wiry mustache showed the glint of strong white teeth under it as, utterly ignoring Doctor White and Jessica, he ordered one of the men to let go the anchor.

Doctor White raised himself a little in the boat.

"You are too late," he said in a crisp, authoritative voice. "I've got a line fast to this wreck and I claim the salvage from her."

Sebastien utterly ignored this statement. So far as concerned himself and his immediate operations the elderly gentleman and girl in the Whitehall rowboat might not have been there at all. The swarthy, stolid youth who had gone forward cleared the turns of chain cable from the winch and let go the anchor.

Jessica, as if awakening from a trance, whipped up her gown and enveloped her dripping body in its folds. Sebastien stepped nimbly forward to the well deck of the boat and threw a tarpaulin from something placed there. Doctor White saw this to be a diver's air pump.

The third man, who had gone into the cuddy aft, came out with his arms full of the helmet and other gear. The youth forward stoppered the cable, then took off his oilskin overcoat. The two other men did likewise, then carried on briskly their preparations.

During these rapid evolutions not one of them so much as threw a glance at the rowboat and the pair aboard it, almost alongside.

"Are we going to stand for this, Gardy? I'm afraid of that—that man. I—I really wouldn't care to elope with him, the—the way he'd do it!"

Doctor White glanced at Jessica and shook his head. He had been watching silently the rapid preparations going on aboard the vessel. Jessica shivered a little, but not from cold, because her woolen gown was warm and heavy, and the night chill had by this time left the air, while the sun, trying to burn its way through the fluffy fog, gave it a muggy warmth that promised a little later to make a hot, still day. The shiver was one of nervous tension and expectation, due to something in her guardian's silent waiting.

At the end of several minutes this began to tell on Sebastien's nerves. The strain of Indian blood that first had motived his grim taciturnity was unequal to the support of it when flung back at him in so assured a way. The predominant Latin blood of the mongrel started to fume and seethe and to demand some sort of safety valve. Sebastien began to breathe lurid curses at his men for their slowness, and from under his black eyebrows he shot more frequent malevolent glances at the calmly vigilant watcher in the rowboat.

Then all at once, the volitile principles in his cosmos fetched away from their container, blew out the plug of it, so to speak. He had picked up the helmet and seemed about to try it on when, glancing at the rowboat, he flung it down on deck again and strode to the main rigging, seizing a shroud in one grimy hand.

"What you want?" he snarled. "Why don't you clear out 'bout your business? What you t'ink you goin' do?"

Doctor White did not move a muscle. He neither smiled nor frowned, but continued to regard the furious Sebastien as if he had been a violent inmate of an institution for the criminally insane. Jessica's heart beat a little faster, but she, too, preserved her disdainful calm. Sebastien seized the other shroud and shook both parts enragedly, like a great ape might tug at the bars of his cage.

"I know you, mister," he snarled. "I see dem French officers go long your house. You t'ink you find out what dey lookin' for and beat 'em. You t'ink you play 'em one lousy tr'rick. I fool you, by dam'!"

This frenzied outburst brought no more response than before. Doctor White took out his watch, glanced at it, then returned to his fixed contemplation of Sebastien. Wheeling from the rigging, Sebastien picked up the helmet again, half raised it, then scowled across at Doctor White. A curious indecision seemed to possess the man. Doctor White, as if observing it, half turned in his seat and, drawing in the line that anchored the boat to the wreck until it led nearly at an angle of eighty degrees, caught a turn of it through the ringbolt.

Then all at once the fog that had obscured his motive from Jessica's mind cleared as the sea fog that enveloped them seemed almost ready to do under the hot rays of the mounting sun. She suddenly was able to appreciate the reason for Sebastien's fury; the man was afraid to go down while this unknown quantity of a doctor was there alongside in a rowboat. And even going down, he would never dare loose the doctor's line with that telltale tension on it.

If there is any one job at which the worker requires full assurance of his helpers' undistracted attention, it is that of the diver in armor. What if while he were down there some ruction were to arise? Or even a temporary diversion? Such would not need to be protracted very long to finish his interest in the affair.

As Sebastien could not help but see the situation, there was this infernal doctor, possessed no doubt of all his cult's coldbloodedness, claiming the wreck by virtue of his having got a line fast to it, and now waiting calmly for Sebastien to submerge himself for the taking of measures that might result in a shortage of free air.

Viewed from this angle, it was by no means an attractive proposition for the diver. If that girl were amphibian enough to take a line down and make it fast to some part of the wreck, then it would not tax her resources greatly to slip overboard with a knife and gash his air pipe and hoisting line. In fact, she looked quite capable of some such fiendish act, sitting there regarding Sebastien with a fixed glare of waiting vengeance that made him want to cross himself.

Here was the coil in which Sebastien found himself, and it left him to take his choice of three courses, none of which he admired. The first was to go ahead and dive and take a chance on what might happen. The second was to call the bet a dead loss because of his delay in playing it. The third most appealed to the savage nature of the man, to seize and destroy and obliterate all trace of these two in the rowboat who seemed all set to blast the success of his venture.

If Sebastien's present errand had been rum-running, Doctor White would not have taken such a chance. Being what it was, he did not believe that there were any firearms aboard the boat, because Sebastien knew that he might expect a minute overhauling at any time, as long as his suspicious-looking craft was in Yankee waters, and he would be clever enough to avoid the slightest evidence against him of preparation for offensive or defensive action.

But the doctor's intuitions were marvelously keen and swift, and as Sebastien now stood glaring at them across that perilously short space of separate water the doctor received such an impact of murderous intention as to shatter his psychology, or more properly, to stimulate it. It was borne in upon him instantly that his estimates had been faulty, and in a surge of horror he realized how easy it would be for this hot-headed desperado to whip out a gun, fire point blank at Jessica and himself, then sink their bodies with the boat, made fast to a few pigs of iron ballast. The chances were strong that no one ever would know.

The doctor acted in swift obedience to his impulse. He jerked out the slip hitch that he had caught through the ringbolt with the line, threw overboard the buoy he previously had attached to the end of it, whirled to the after thwart and grabbed the oars. As he did so, Sebastien, as if galvanized into sudden action, pitched into the cabin of the cruiser. Like any other savage beast of primal instinct, his ferocity was inflamed by the startled flight of a quarry that had faced him boldly up to this moment. No doubt Doctor White was correct in his perception of a murderous assault on the verge of its discharge, and it is fairly certain that his anticipation of it was all that saved the lives of Jessica and himself.

That—and the fact that Sebastien's movements were clogged by the leaden soles of his diving outfit. When he plunged out on deck again, snarling with rage at his indecision and waving a big automatic pistol, the doctor had come near to establishing a rowing record for one hundred yards single sculls in a badly trimmed Whitehall boat, and presented a poor target in the fog.

The Port of Pompeii

Excavations have brought to light what was once the port of Pompeii. In a tavern were found the skeletons of three men trapped while drinking wine.

No Need for Parents to Respond to Whys?

It has recently become a truism among modern popularizers of knowledge and extollers of children that the same urge prompts the scientist to peer into his test tube, the metaphysician to enquire into the infinite, and the child to ask its parents "why?"

Conscientious parents, fortified by the most newly approved "outlines" and a prodigious patience, have striven valiantly to satisfy this craving.

Jean Piaget, Geneva psychologist, after analyzing 1,125 spontaneous questions asked of the same adult by a boy from the time he was six years and three months old until he was seven years and one month, has decided that it makes little difference how we answer a child's questions—or whether we answer them at all.

In the first place, just because a child lets drop a "why" when addressing an adult does not invariably mean that he expects an answer. Often he is only making a simple assertion or, and more frequently still, contradicting his elder with cunning tact.

"The child," says Piaget, "is apparently asking 'Why do you say this?' or 'Why do you want this?' etc. As a matter of fact, the question simply amounts to saying 'That's not true' or 'I don't want to.'" So an adult who values his peace of mind will leave these "whys of motivation" strictly unattended to.—Grace Adams in the American Mercury.

Joke on the Jokers

Serious results followed an attempt to speak with the dead at midnight in a churchyard at Stari Bechaj, Jugoslavia. The spokesman called out, "Cheerio, O dead, what are you doing?" To his horror a booming voice from one of the tombs answered, "Some of us smoke, some sleep, some merely sit—each man as he likes," and a bright light shone from the tomb into his face. Terrified, he and his friends took to their heels, but through tripping and tumbling among the tombstones three broke their legs and received internal injuries. One later died. Police proved it was the work of a practical joker.

For That "Perfect" Dinner

Hostess Must Remember That Quality of Service Is a Most Important Consideration in the Success of the Function.

The enjoyment of a meal, no matter how perfect the food, depends much upon the service. This is one of the points which we recognize more often in its absence than in its presence. For instance, not long ago I took some friends from out of town to a luncheon in a restaurant which has been much written about in the last two years.

I had been there a number of times, and must have had excellent service because I enjoyed the well-prepared food and the pleasant surroundings, without distraction. But on this occasion it was most amazing to everyone, and embarrassing to the hostess, to wait long for each course and finally to have to go without dessert. Some unexpected crisis in the kitchen or the dining room service must have been responsible, because when I went back last week the service was normally good, and it was possible to do justice to the tomato juice cocktail, the sauted soft-shelled crab served with almonds and apples, the mixed vegetable salad, the iced coffee and the strawberry tart. I am glad I went back instead of crossing that pleasant restaurant off my list.

A day or two later I went down the Jersey shore and had luncheon at a small place run by a Scandinavian woman who directs and does part of the cooking herself. The cream of chicken soup was well flavored, the lobster was tender, the potato salad was seasoned just right, the apple pie was worthy of its name, and the coffee, as you would expect, was delicious. One course followed the other in perfect succession. Perfect, in connection with service, means orderly. Service can be too quick—it is not pleasant to have the plate snatched from under one's fork while there are still a few delicious morsels left to trifle with.

While my family is always criticizing me for eating too fast, I can't keep up with some of my friends. At one house, where they serve the most delicious food, the family devours it with such speed, and the waitress is so accustomed to their marathon of eating, that I hardly get a start at one course before my plate is whisked away to make place—fortunately—for another just as delicious dish.

In planning to entertain guests at meals, about the first thing to consider is the matter of service. It is possible to cook and serve a meal perfectly without any extra help, if it is planned properly. Guests will enjoy the simplest form, served easily, better than the most elaborate which strains the capacity of the hostess. A buffet supper is a much better choice when ten or twelve guests are to be served, than a dinner when there is only one waitress—or none.

Here are some good menu suggestions:

LESSON FOR ALL IN OLD SPANISH WRITER'S FABLE

Le Sage, the genial chronicler of "The Adventures of Gil Blas," was not content to send his book into the world without some admonishment to readers that they seek instruction as well as pleasure. So this enchanting story teller introduced his work with a fable.

Two students, traveling to Salamanca, chanced upon a spring at the roadside and, having paused to quench their thirst, they noticed a stone which, though partly overgrown by weeds, bore traces of an old inscription. The two youths cleared away the foliage and dirt and succeeded in deciphering an inscription in pure Castilian: "Here lies buried the soul of Peter Garcian, the Licentiate."

One of the students burst into a loud guffaw at the suggestion that any man's soul could be interred in the earth and, with a sneer at the absurdity of the legend, went on his way. But his fellow considered: "There is some mystery here"; and remained to make further investigation. With some difficulty, digging with his knife, he managed to get the stone up. Beneath it lay a bag of gold with a card upon which was written: "Thou who hast had wit to discover the meaning of the inscription, I make mine heir."

Now, it is the virtue of a good fable that it is never blunted by passage of time; and that has been the fortune of the parable set down by Le Sage urging his readers to delve for treasures which are not to be found on the surface of life. The question pierces to the heart of a matter of genuine import, for it involves heritages in cultural treasure which are forever challenging the will and effort of man.—Boston Globe.

Precocious Boy Not to Be Set Down as "Bad"

A boy who gets into trouble in school may not be bad, but only one of the precocious children who constitute one-fourth of school enrollment, Dr. Thomas A. C. Rennie, of the staff of the Phipps Psychiatric clinic, recently said in an address at Baltimore.

"The precocious children," explained Doctor Rennie, "have a superior intelligence and complete their work in advance of others in their class. Frequently in seeking amusement for idle moments during class hours they get into mischief and occasion teachers a great deal of annoyance.

"Another group of school children, constituting about 25 per cent, are mentally retarded," said Doctor Rennie, "and, being urged by parents and teachers to strain beyond their mental abilities, become problem children."

Japanese in America

The largest number of Japanese in this country, as shown by any census report, was 138,834 in 1930, an increase of about 27,000 in ten years. Practically all of them are in the far western states, California having about 70 per cent of the Japanese of this country. A very large proportion are now native American citizens of the Japanese race.

HOBBIES DEAR TO HEARTS OF MEN IN HIGH PLACES

President Roosevelt's hobby for collecting marine pictures is a reminder that other Presidents have had hobbies as well.

President Warren G. Harding collected pipes, as many as he could get, of all sizes and varieties from all parts of the world. Many of these he kept on his broad desk, in what was then the private study of the President on the second floor of the White House. Pipes were placed on book shelves about the room. President Harding smoked one pipe only in his private study, although he had other pipes in the Executive offices which he liked to smoke occasionally.

Another collector-President was Calvin Coolidge, who would go to much trouble to get original editions of law books, or autographed copies of more modern ones. He always wrote in the book the date it came into his possession and where he had obtained it.

Another rare book collector was the sixth President of the United States, John Quincy Adams, who gathered rare books from all over the world and particularly treasured those that had been collected by his father.

The late speaker of the house of representatives, Champ Clark, of Missouri, not only had a collection of gavels but of corn-cob pipes as well. Speaker Clark kept these collections in his desk in the speaker's office. It was a mark of rare favor to be shown them and to be told their origin and history.

Andrew Mellon, former secretary of the treasury and former ambassador to Great Britain, has a notable gallery of paintings, many of rare value.

Admiral George Dewey was a collector of watches and was the recipient of many handsome jeweled ones from countries and organizations eager to honor him in this way.

Bathtub Once Shunned as Something Unholy

After the fall of Rome and the rise of the Christian empire, the bather became an outlaw. Evangelists, citing the unholy Romans, spread the gospel that bathing invited moral and spiritual destruction. Superstition came along to put evil spells in an overdose of water, taken externally. (Beliefs that bathing is harmful, if not deadly, except on certain days of the year, still prevail in certain parts of Europe today.) In time, medical authority was found to insist that bathing was unhealthful.

For hundreds of years, Europe literally went without a bath. The first settlers in America belonged to the anti-tub faith. In all the history of the early colonists, there is no record of a pioneer being surprised by an attacking Indian while taking a dip in river, creek or pond. The observance of the prohibition against bathing was so general and profound that it just was not an issue at all worth mentioning, until long after the United States had become a nation.

In these later days, invention of the tub has been credited by some writers to America. This false assumption doubtless has been provoked by the late but sensational development of plumbing in this country. However, Europe was experimenting with the predecessor of the modern tub long before the American settlers had a good bath.—Kansas City Star.

Seeks Alexander's Tomb

Enthusiastic over his proposed expedition to find the body of Alexander the Great, Howard Carter, discoverer of the tomb of Tut-Ankh-Amen has arrived in Alexandria, Egypt, to raise the necessary $240,000 for the venture. Should Alexander's tomb be discovered, he said, it would be the most important acheological find ever made in Egypt, even more important than the Tut-Ankh-Amen discovery. The contents of Alexander the Great's tomb, he believes, would consist chiefly of metal, whose intrinsic value would not be as great as the Tut-Ankh-Amen relics. There is the possibility, he added, that Alexander's tomb has been covered by the sea. The system he would use in searching for the tomb he described as "sondage," or sinking of pipes.

Tormented for Five Years with Dandruff

Healed by Cuticura

"For nearly five years I was tormented with dandruff. My scalp itched and burned and became very sore and red from scratching. My hair became thin and dry and fell out in handfuls, and the dandruff scaled off and could be seen on my clothing.

"I had lost all hope of ever being healed. A friend told me about Cuticura Soap and Ointment and I sent for a free sample. The Great American Bean

WHAT do you suppose would happen if every bean, of every kind, should suddenly disappear from these United States? What, no baked beans? No limas? No string beans? It is just unthinkable, and our morale takes a nose dive at the very suggestion!

However, you needn't begin to get despondent over any such a possibility, because that is one of the last calamities that is likely to happen to us.

In the first place the bean crop is one of the largest and most generally produced of all our vegetables, and in the second place, with the "packs" put up by the canners each year there is always a huge store of reserves.

Delicious Bean Recipes

So, just to soothe your feelings and make up for the horrible idea that we put into your mind in our first sentence, there are some perfectly delicious bean recipes that will make your people call for more and still more.

Boston Supper Rarebit: One tablespoon butter, one and one-half cups grated cheese, a few grains cayenne, one-fourth teaspoon salt, one-fourth teaspoon mustard, one egg, one-third cup cream, two cans bean-hole beans. Melt butter, add cheese and cook very slowly until melted. Add seasonings. Beat eggs, add cream and add very slowly to the cheese, cooking until smooth, stirring constantly. Pour at once over hot beans. Serves six.

Lima Bean Salad: One 8-ounce can lima beans, one tablespoon chopped onions, one-fourth cup chopped celery, one-fourth cup chopped cucumber, four teaspoons French dressing, two slices bacon (fried), six leaves lettuce. Drain beans, add onion, celery and cucumber, and marinate in the French dressing for at least one hour. Add bacon broken or cut into small pieces and serve in lettuce leaves. Serves six.*

Harvey W. Wiley

To Protect Public

THE canned food industry as a whole is solidly behind the new "pure food law" which has been drafted at the instance of President Roosevelt by Assistant Secretary Tugwell and other officials of the United States Department of Agriculture and submitted to Congress by Senator Royal S. Copeland.

Back in 1906 when the original pure food law was drafted, owing to the activities of the late Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, widely known as the "father of the pure food law," its provisions met fairly well the conditions existing at that time.

"Other problems in the control of foods and drugs have come about through changed modes of living," says a circular from the Department of Agriculture. "Where most foods were once prepared in the housewife's own kitchen, today more and more foods are prepared outside the home. Thanks to modern scientific methods of production, many of them are cheaper and better than the housewife could prepare."

It is not against this many that the additional provisions of the new food law are aimed but against the small minority of products not properly prepared or dishonestly advertised which tend to bring discredit on the entire industry.

Another Step In Advance

The first step in advance from the provisions of the original pure food law was taken when President Hoover signed the McNary Mapes Amendment to it on July 8, 1929. The industry as a whole enthusiastically advocated both the original law and this amendment. The passing of the revised pure food law, which is expected to come before the next session of Congress, would be a second step in advance.*

Marshall County C. W. A. Setup Is Outlined

There has been a good deal of confusion regarding the CWA and the various people and offices connected with it. In hopes that we may clarify the set-up somewhat, the following is offered:

H. T. Swanson, county engineer, is the supervisor of all engineering projects and must approve of all such projects. Consequently all such applications must be filed with him and information regarding same should go to him.

Einar Aakre, county manager of the National Reemployment Service, is the man who selects the men for various projects. He selects them from registration lists according to the qualifications shown. Classification according to financial standing is no longer the sole basis on which men are chosen.

All requests for work, complaints regarding men working, misuse of wages, etc., should be written to Mr. Aakre.

Stephen S. Easter, County Relief worker, is the certifying officer of the CWA. In this capacity he is responsible for the payrolls of the workers. He does not select the workers except for Relief cases, who are all working now. Requests for work and complaints of various nature can only be referred to Mr. Aakre. CWA records are all kept in the local relief office at present.

Northwest School News

Enrollment figures released by J. W. Mlinar, registrar at the Northwest School of Agriculture Crookston, show a fifty-four percent increase over one year ago. The total enrolment will exceed the three hundred mark before the end of the week. Students from four states are in attendance. The honor of coming the greatest distance goes to Charles Ebell of Baker, Oregon, with second honors going to Guy Richwine of Medicine Lake, Montana.

The increased interest in agricultural, home economics and business courses, according to T. M. McCall, acting superintendent, indicates a desire on the part of Red River Valley youth to keep abreast of the developments in agricultural production and home making. Graduates of the Northwest School are rapidly assuming positions of rural leadership.

The most recent example of this is the appointment of Evelyn Bierbaum, a graduate of the class of '29, as director of the county housing survey of West Polk County. The housing survey is a study made by the Federal government under a civil works project, in which a few representative counties are selected in each state. Miss Bierbaum has fourteen women assistants, four of whom are former Northwest School students or graduates. The list includes Beulah Harris, Esther Gibbons, Estelle Filipi and Helga Moe.

Marie Johanson of Pitt, Minn., a junior at the Northwest school of Agriculture, won first in a statewide essay contest in which there were 140 contestants. Miss Johanson won as her prize a free trip to St. Paul donated by the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, sponsors of the contest. The contest was conducted under the leadership of T. A. Erickson, State leader of 4-H club work, assisted in the Red River Valley by H. A. Pflughhoeft, district leader. Miss Johanson will leave for St. Paul January 15, to appear on the Tuesday program and be one of the honored guests at the Wednesday banquet. The title of Marie's winning essay was "Cooperation".

Several farmers around here held a hay hauling "bee" for C. A. Davis on Saturday. Mr. Davis has his hay crop in Mud Lake and the hired man does not get time besides the chores at home to go out, so the neighbors and farmer friends in the community went out to do this favor for him. We all hope to see him come home feeling better after such a streak of hard luck.

All Is Quiet And Dry Along The Western Front

From all indications it looks as if Red Lake Falls will be the only place where a fellow will be able to eek out a legal drink in the quiet dry western front. The story according to an Associated Press report in a northwest daily reads as follows:

Minnesota's border counties may prove disappointing to residents of neigboring states who expected to take an advantage of the legislature's legalization of liquor sales.

Twenty eight of the 87 counties in the state are dry under the law until voters decide otherwise, they having opposed repeal at a special referendum last September. Thirteen of the dry counties lie along border lines.

In other counties all municipalities will be permitted to issue liquor sale permits as soon as the machinery is established by local governments, probably within ten days.

Residents of Grand Forks and that section of North Dakota must travel at least 40 miles to Red Lake county to obtain legal liquor after licenses have been issued. Red Lake county is the only wet county entirely sorrounded by dry territory. Fargo residents must travel east to Becker county or southeast to Wilkin county, near Wahpeton.

On the western line of the state seven dry counties border North and South Dakota. Of these Kittson, Marshall, Polk, Norman and Clay present a solid front to most of the eastern territory of North Dakota, leaving only Wilkin county as a wet border entry.

Lac Qui Parle and Yellow Medicine on the line facing South Dakota are dry, with the remainder of the line counties being permitted to establish a system of liquor sales immedately if they desire.

Four of the nine southern border counties next to Iowa are dry. They are Martin, Faribault, Freeborn, and Fillmore. On the eastern border, Chisago is the only dry county bordering Wisconsin.

Facing Canada, the only dry county is Roseau, in addition to the northern section of Kittson county.

Other dry counties within the state are Pennington, Clearwater, Ottertail, Douglas, Grant, Pope, Swift, Chippewa, Kandiyohi, Meeker, Cottonwood, Watonwan, Dodge, Iranti, and Mille Lacs.

In Minnesota there is no dry county except Kittson entirely surrounded by dry counties. Roseau east of Kittson, is dry, as is Marshall, forming the southern boundry. The residents, however have Canada on the northern boundry.

Hearse Honeymoon

Clearwater.— A honeymoon in a hearse was held by Charles J. King and his recent bride of Mission, Texas, when they brot a corpse from that town to Clearwater, Minn., recently. At the time they planned to wed, the manager of an undertaking firm for which King works chose him to make the trip with the corpse. After delivering the body, they made a visit to the bride's relatives in Iowa and a short visit to Chicago, and then returned home in the hearse.

Mrs. Sam Lorentson and Mrs. L. M. Redal visited with Mrs. Geo Fricker Thursday afternoon.

State Highway Expenses Cut In Half In 1933

Expenditures of the Minnesota highway department were reduced more than 50 per cent in 1933 compared with 1932, according to a statement by N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner.

Disbursements of the highway department for the past year totalled $17,000,000, in round numbers, compared with more than $35,000,000 in 1932, making a reduction of $18,000,000. The total spent by the department in 1933 was less than half as much as was expended in either 1931 or 1930.

Considering only state funds and regular Federal aid carried from 1932, the highway department spent less in 1933 than in any year since 1928, Mr. Elsberg said. Inclusion of Emergency National Recovery Act funds from the Federal government brings the total to $17,000,000, the smallest spent since 1928. State funds and regular federal aid amounted to only $14,400,000.

The total of 1933 disbursements was nearly $2,000,000 less than the average spent by the department each year from 1921 to 1932 inclusive. The average expenditures in this twelve-year period were nearly $19,000,000 a year.

Following are highway department expenditures, in round numbers, for the past five years:

1933	$17,000,000.
1932	35,000,000.
1931	34,000,000.
1930	34,000,000.
1929	20,000,000.

Included in the 1933 total is $2,600,000 of NRA federal funds from the $10,600,000 allotted to Minnesota highways in the fall of the year. Another $3,000,000 of this money has been obligated, leaving a $5,000,000 carry-over for 1934.

The department laid 96 miles of concrete pavement in 1933, did 176 miles of grading, 243 miles of graveling and put in 25 miles of bituminous surfacing. It built 18 new bridges, rebuilt 2 bridges and repaired 100. In addition there was a large amount of miscellaneous work, besides such fixed charges as maintenance of the entire trunk system, payment of interest and principal on bonds and purchase of righ-of-way and equipment. Labor and construction costs in 1933 were considerably higher than in 1932.

Who Got The Battery?

While driving into town Sunday, Oliver Davidson had the misfortune of rolling his car over in the ditch when something went wrong with the steering gear. While he was in town to get a truck to pull him out, a fellow from Thief River Falls came by and stole his new battery out of the car.

As luck would have it, Oliver got trace of the car and called Ye editor to help him out. We threw the old chevy into high and hit the trail at 60 per, bucking a strong head wind. When we caught the party near Thief River we surprised to find him a former neighbor boy of Mr. Davidson. But he does not live here anymore.

Show Your Loyalty Now To The Telephone Co.

We were recently informed by one of the members of the board of directors of the local telephone exchange that, they have decided to continue service here for the next three months under the old system.

A lot of meetings have been called for the purpose of settling the matter as to whether they should stay open and operate at a loss or, shut down the telephone exchange here Very few of those whom have phones have showed up and offered any good suggestions. The reason being that most of them owe a large sum for dues for last year, the year before that, and some for several years past:

No company can operate on such a hang-on proposition. It is those that come back in a sore way and say they got no service. How could they expect it when their line was cut because they owed dues for three or four long years? and?

You all know that you have to put wood in the stove before you can expect any heat. Now you are again given a chance to pay up and get service.

The company will operate the first three months in 1934 on the old scale and have billed you for that amount of dues to keep an operator and buy fuel at the local telephone exchange.

Now, if you all get into the harness and pull together maybe you can still put the whole layout on a cash basis and all have service. But you must cooperate and try to do your part on dues.

President Roosevelt on World Peace and Armed Intervention—Harmonious Session of Congress Predicted—All Gold Holdings Demanded.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

President Roosevelt

WOODROW WILSON'S birthday was celebrated in Washington by a dinner given by the foundation that bears his name, and President Roosevelt, as chief speaker, vigorously attacked political leaders of the world for frustrating the hopes of the peoples for world peace. Ninety per cent of the population of the earth, he averred, is desirous that there shall be no more wars; but the remaining 10 per cent are misled by politicians who have imperialistic designs and selfish motives. His impressive closing sentences were:

"Through all the centuries and down to the world conflict of 1914 to 1918, wars were made by governments. Woodrow Wilson challenged that necessity. That challenge made the people, who create and who change governments, think. They wondered with Woodrow Wilson whether the people themselves could not some day prevent governments from making war.

"It is an extension of the challenge of Woodrow Wilson for us to propose in this newer generation that from now on war by governments shall be changed to peace by peoples."

Mr. Roosevelt's peace plan, offered to the world, may be thus summarized:

Every nation would agree to eliminate over a period of years and by progressive steps all weapons of offense, keeping only permanent defensive implements. Each nation could inspect its neighbor to insure against offensive weapons.

Every nation would join in a simple declaration that no armed forces would be allowed to cross its borders into the territory of any other nation.

By ruling that such pacts would be effective unless all nations agreed the nations still believing "in the use of the sword for invasion" would be pointed out to the pressure of world opinion.

The President also proclaimed a modification of the Monroe Doctrine, asserting that it would henceforth be the policy of the United States to undertake no single-handed armed intervention in any of the American republics. He declared that it was the joint obligation of all those republics to intervene in any one of them if such interference should become necessary to protect their interests.

Praise was given the League of Nations for its manifold achievements, but the President said it had been handicapped from the start by motives of political profit, personal prestige and national aggrandizement.

"We are not members and we do not contemplate membership," the President added. "We are giving cooperation to the league in every matter which is not primarily political and in every matter which obviously represents the views and the good of the peoples of the world as distinguished from the views and the good of political leaders, of privileged classes or of imperialistic aims."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT announced that he had accepted the long expected resignation of William H. Woodin as secretary of the treasury, and appointed Henry Morgenthau, Jr., to succeed him. Mr. Morgenthau took the oath of office on New Year's day in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt and the members of his own family.

Mr. Woodin's retirement had been expected since last summer. He is still in Arizona endeavoring to recover his health.

THOUGH the year closed with prices for farm products and manufactured foods showing a downward trend; though the estimates of the government and of grain dealers revealed that the acreage reduction program on which the Agriculture department spent vast sums was virtually a failure, and though there were other discouraging signs, on the whole President Roosevelt and his advisers had reason to believe the new year promised to see considerable success achieved by their recovery plans. Many leaders in economy and politics gave them this assurance, and there was manifested a general determination to go along further with the President and support his efforts.

Speaker Rainey

Congress began its session January 3 and Speaker Rainey, after a talk with Mr. Roosevelt, predicted confidently that the session would be harmonious and devoted mainly to appropriation and revenue legislation.

"We are going to have a short and constructive session," said Mr. Rainey. "It will be a very important session, but a working one rather than a dramatic one. We will pass the supply bills, the tax bills and the liquor measures and adjourn early in May.

"There will be no attempt to overthrow the recovery program or to oppose the President. It isn't possible. If there is any sniping the snipers are apt to be left at home.

"We had the extra session and enacted the recovery program and it is just beginning to work. Recovery is on the way."

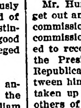
DEVALUATION of the dollar appears to be a certainty of the not distant future, and the Treasury department is getting ready for that step. To start with, it is about to seize all remaining private holdings of gold. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., now secretary, in an order issued under the emergency banking law, demanded the surrender of all gold holdings, with five specific exceptions, regardless of their size.

Previous anti-hoarding orders had allowed an exemption for private holdings of $100 or less. Morgenthau explained especially that this exemption has now been wiped away and that a new drive against large hoarders who have not previously complied has been launched.

Failure to follow the treasury's order and conviction carries a maximum penalty of ten years in prison, $10,000 in fines, or both. The order applies to corporations, partnerships, and associations as well as individuals.

One important exception which still blocks the way to devaluation was left in the new gold order. Federal reserve banks, which own $3,700,000,000 in gold and gold certificates out of a total American gold stock of $4,300,000,000, were still allowed to keep their gold. How to deprive the reserve banks of this gold legally, or at least of the profit which the banks would otherwise reap from devaluation, has long been puzzling treasury legal experts.

NOW it is up to the United States Court of Claims to decide whether or not President Roosevelt's action in removing William E. Humphrey as a member of the federal trade commission last October was "illegal and void." Mr. Humphrey has filed with the court a petition demanding from the United States $1,251.30 which he says is due him as his salary from October 8 to November 30. He laid before the court a transcript of four letters from the President. Two of them requested his resignation, a third accepted his resignation, although Mr. Humphrey contended, none had been offered, while a fourth contained only these words:



W. E. Humphrey

"I am in receipt of your letter of September 27. Effective as of this date (October 7) you are hereby removed from the office of commissioner of the federal trade commission."

Mr. Humphrey refused to resign or get out and formally notified the trade commission of that refusal; but the commission wrote him that it had voted to recognize the executive order of the President. Mr. Humphrey is a Republican and the controversy between him and Mr. Roosevelt has been taken up as a political issue by some others of that party. It is certain to be the subject of oratory and argument in congress. For fourteen years Mr. Humphrey represented the state of Washington in congress, and he was appointed to the trade commission by President Coolidge in 1925 and re-appointed by President Hoover in 1931.

FRIENDS of Representative Robert L. Doughton of North Carolina, chairman of the house ways and means committee, expect that President Roosevelt will soon appoint him a member of the federal tariff commission. Probably this will be delayed until after the liquor and general tax revision bills are passed by the house, for both of these administration measures are being handled by Doughton's committee.

TORRENTIAL rains lasting many hours wrought disaster in Los Angeles and its suburbs for floods rushed through the towns and countryside and probably 75 or more lives were lost. Glendale, Montrose, La Crescenta, Echo Park, Long Beach, Alamitos Beach, Venice, Redondo Beach and other towns were those in the direct path of the inundation. It was in these places that the heaviest toll of life occurred.

All the valleys in the region were turned into lakes, and the property damage was immense.

SOME weeks ago Jon G. Duca, premier of Rumania, outlawed the Iron Guard, an anti-Jewish organization. He has paid the penalty, for a member of the guard assassinated him in a railway station in Sinaia. The murderer, who was arrested with two accomplices, proudly admitted his crime.

The assassination came as a climax to a long series of disorders characteristic of the new wave of anti-Semitic radicalism which has swept Rumania since the victory of Chancellor Hitler's anti-Jewish campaign in Germany.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of salvaging a long-sunken French corvette. The comte De Corlay and his son Robert claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A sailor, Sebastien, also is seeking the treasure. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay and Tom agree to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered. Doctor White arranges for a professional diver to go down to the hulk of the Fourquet. Next morning, the diver having failed to appear, Jessica dives and attaches a line to the Fourquet. Then Sebastien, with two companions, arrives. Doctor White tells him they have legally established a salvage claim, and Sebastien produces a revolver, apparently intent on killing both the girl and the doctor.

Sebastien, although perceiving that he probably had missed his coup even then might have trusted to good marksmanship to retrieve it. But as he steadied himself to ascertain how big the target looked against his sights the sound of a motor boat's exhaust pulsed on his ear drums. Caution gripped him, and the reflection that so far he had actually committed no overt act of violence. He lowered his weapon and peered into the fog.

Jessica also had heard the approaching boat. So likewise had Doctor White, but not until he saw dimly through the thinning mist that Sebastien's arm had fallen to his side did he rest upon his oars, panting.

"That," said he to Jessica, "was a pretty close call."

"How did you guess what he was up to, Gardy?"

"Call it radio telepathy. The wave lengths hereabouts are equal, and the messages of international code. Who is that coming? You know the bark of all these boats."

"Ed Gammond's—Tom," said Jessica, and added fiercely, "If Tom sinks that loupgarou that tried to murder us—I'll marry him. I will if I have to make a stake for him, myself!" And then, as if realizing that a swift tongue had betrayed an innermost, secret thought, she blushed a rosy hue which even the mantling fog could not obscure.

CHAPTER VII

To follow briefly the oblique movements of Dave MacFarlane's diver, Mike Castello, the night before, and after his departure from Friendship. Mike was a steady, reliable Portuguese who was thrifty to a fault—that same being the higher distillation of thrift, which is avarice.

Mike had got hold of some liquor at a bargain, and it struck him that here was a good chance to dispose of it at a profit. New Harbor was not much out of his course around Pemaquid point, and Mike knew that there were just then several Portuguese mackerel boats fishing out of that port. He decided to duck in, dispose of his wares and proceed upon his voyage.

This little trading venture met with gratifying, but limited success. There was not enough ready cash in the foreign crowd to pay for the whole lot, so Mike decided to dispose of the remainder as a market offered.

Then, just as he was about to put out on the last lap of his voyage, a French Canadian from a Miquelon boat that had blown in there came over to find out what all the joy was about. He bought a quart of it, paying from a big roll of money that he dragged from some recess of his sash and that left a hollow until replaced.

He was the "patron," it appeared, and on learning that Mike was bound out around the point from Bristol, to do a diving job for Doctor White, a sunk boat or something, the Miquelon skipper asked Mike for a ride around there with him, saying that he wanted to get a new stuffing box for his ship's tail shaft at Boothbay Harbor the next morning; and that a friendly lift would save him running around to East Boothbay in his own boat.

What Sebastien, for he was the "patron," really wanted, of course, was the chance to tamper a bit with the diving gear heaped up in the forward part of the cabin. He had seen the De Corlays leaving Whale island that afternoon, concluding, naturally, that Doctor White had offered them aid in their endeavor and had looked up a diver for them.

With true sailor hospitality, Mike not only offered to set him on his way, but put a spare bunk at his disposal for the night.

It may therefore be understood how thoroughly the skids were greased for the launching of Tom and Robert into a cross chop of troubled waters. Mike, his thrift loosened by the practical demonstration that his wares were wholesome, had gone below to serve himself another little nip just when Tom's launch passed them. So Sebastien was steering the vessel. His keen eyes sighted her white side, and followed her as she made her turn to fall in astern of him.

Sebastien could not guess just what was afoot, for radio telepathy has its limitations, but he scented trouble. The chances were he thought, that they were being followed by an official launch on the lookout for bootleggers.

He had a frantic moment. They were towing a dory, and he was tempted to haul it up under the stern, drop into it and cast off. But he reckoned that he could not manage this without being detected from the following launch, when such action would be taken as a proof of guilt. Besides, there was the chance that their pursuers might not be officers at all, but gentry with a thirst, who on sighting the cruiser sneaking along the shore without lights, had made a good guess as to her possibilities. And for Sebastien to decamp would be for him to lose his chance of spiking his rival's guns.

Glancing astern, Sebastien saw that the launch was rapidly overhauling them, not more than a furlong away. He called to Mike and told him of the pickle, then advised the jettison of the incriminating evidence. But Mike's thrift flared up at this idea.

Nevertheless he was nervous. Telling Sebastien to haul the dory alongside, Mike ducked below, lugged out the whisky case and lowering it into the dory threw over it a worn old sail that served as a coverlet when he slept aboard. The darkness was opaque enough to prevent the discovery of this maneuver from the distance of the following boat. And at that moment the fog siren on Monhegan began to bellow like a cow moose.

CHAPTER VIII

Tom and Robert, fairly—and for that matter accurately—convinced that it was indeed Sebastien there ahead of them, were in no pressing hurry to overhaul their quarry. They were getting down toward the end of the promontory where there is a cottage colony, and there seemed no particular object in staging their proposed spectacle too conspicuously. Tom slowed the motor to a speed that kept the boat ahead barely visible.

Then all at once the siren of Monhegan blared, twelve miles seaward. Tom clapped his hands together softly. "Fog coming in." Robert gave a cry of dismay. Tom swore and threw the engine into top speed. Although startled he did not despair. The quarry had not been more than two hundred yards ahead when totally extinguished, and it did not seem possible that such a heavy, logy craft could be got out of the track before the rushing launch closed in upon her.

But at the end of three or four minutes Tom felt that he had overshot his mark. He switched off the current and as the motor's purring ceased they heard the muffled coughing of the other boat. But where away? It sounded to port of them, astern, then on the starboard quarter, and remote.

Robert, dancing up and down, pointed over the port bow. "Over there—" he wailed. "Over there—no—out abeam—oh—thunder—!"

Tom frantically started the motor, swinging the boat's bow to port. They rushed madly through the murk, prepared for a collision at any second, and hoping for it. The boat hit nothing but brine and that ponderous nothingness of humid blindness. There being no light anywhere, they could not even see the fog. The phosphorescence of their wash showed itself only as non-darkness rather than active illumination.

Pattering a steady stream of oratorio that was yet not sacred of theme, Tom strove in zigzags through the clammy oblivion. He felt torn into shreds of rage and shame. Born and reared in that region, all his youth spent off and on at sea, and then to be guilty of such a monumental fluke as this!

For several minutes thereafter Tom charged back and forth like a raging bull gone suddenly blind in the arena, while Robert held himself all set for a crash. But no crash occurred. Twice Tom stopped the motor to listen.

Seguin had started mournfully to back up Monhegan, and now Pemaquid's brazen voice said that the going was chancy at its end of the beat.

It struck Tom then that Sebastien scarcely could have got clean away without being heard by Robert and himself during one of their frequent periods of suspended animation. This was the sort of game at which the Miquelon islander would be past master.

The same idea struck Robert. "I'll bet the beggar's lying doggo close aboard, Tom. We'd have heard him otherwise. Stop your engine and keep it stopped. We might drift in against them."

Tom obeyed. He was convinced by this time that Sebastien must have seen them and suspected an attempt to thwart his salvage operations or to postpone them by some sort of an injunction.

Banana Oil

The bronzing solution sometimes called "banana solution" or "banana oil" is composed of equal parts of amyl acetate, acetone, and benzine, with a little pyroxyline dissolved in it. It is called banana oil merely because it smells like bananas, but it contains neither bananas nor oil.

HOW GODDESS OF LUCK SMILED ON HARRY JOHNSON

Ocean island is well named. It is a speck of land about four miles round in the Pacific ocean. Yet it might have been named Eldorado or Bonanza or Golconda, or any other name associated with fabulous riches, because it is probably the richest piece of land in the world.

At one time it was a calling-place for South sea whalers, and one of these casual visitors took away with him a piece of the rock of which the island mainly consists and submitted it to the manager of a New Zealand guano firm which had an office in Sydney. The manager thought little of it, and used it to prop open his office door.

Presently a man named Harry Johnson, an expert in phosphates and other fertilizers, called, and, being attracted by the appearance of the manager's door-stopper, obtained leave to take it away and subject it to tests. These proved that the stone was almost pure phosphate of lime.

Johnson kept his own council, but, having learned from the manager that the stone had come from Ocean island, he went there. He found the island composed of it! Here was incalculable wealth if only it could be exploited, yet Johnson had great difficulty in financing his project.

But the reward was only delayed. There is an almost boundless supply of phosphate of lime, and it is the most powerful fertilizer known. It is used also for match-making and other manufacturing processes.

Today about 2,000 colored laborers, under about 50 white overseers, work the phosphate and ship it to all parts of the world. The total value of the product in sight or eventually available is estimated at $400,000,000.

Pest That Bids Fair to Exterminate Itself

One of the chief pests of Porto Rico is a large leaf-eating weevil known locally as the "vaquita." It normally lays its eggs between two leaves, thereafter sticking the leaves together, to protect the eggs, with a mucilage so tough that the little weevils when ready to emerge, often have difficulty escaping from their nests.

Dr. George N. Wolcott of the Porto Rico insular experiment station recently announced, according to Science Service, that the beetle likes laying its eggs between two sheets of paper, and will do so when paper is available, even in preference to leaves. The insect's mucilage sticks the sheets so fast together that the young are totally unable to escape and hence are automatically trapped by their parents. This method of control is being widely used.—Literary Digest.

Proteins of Immense Value

Their High Importance in Daily Diet Is a Matter Which Under No Circumstances Must Be Overlooked in the Planning of Menus.

"What's become of proteins?" I heard a man say the other day. "It seems to me I never hear them mentioned any more or see them in print since vitamins have become so popular." Perhaps we have neglected talking about protein recently, but it is still just as important a part of the menu as it ever was.

It doesn't seem as necessary for us to stress this importance because most of us who have enough to spend for food are quite likely to get plenty of it in the daily diet, of which it is a most important part, because we depend upon protein to repair the daily wear and tear on the tissues, which go on continually. Children who are building new tissue must have a larger proportion of protein in their food than the grown-ups need. This extra supply is usually, as it should be, in the form of milk. When adults drink milk they take it not so much on this account, but because of its contributions of minerals and vitamins.

Meats, fish, eggs and cheese, besides milk, are the animal foods which provide us with protein. Among the vegetable foods we find the largest contributors are nuts, dried beans, peas and lentils. Breads and cereals give us a worthwhile portion of protein, but most other vegetable foods are lacking. We have changed and rechanged our attitude toward the amount of protein necessary and advisable for diets. It used to be thought it was necessary to provide energy, and this quality was described by the general adjective "strengthening"—whatever that means.

After serious nutrition research work began, it was found that starches, sugars and fats furnished energy, and just as satisfactorily and more efficiently. Also that after the body had used what protein it needed to repair the tissues it was able to burn the rest as fuel for energy. The American nutritionists felt that a smaller proportion of protein was essential than did the German workers. Then came the theory that it was unwise to take more than 10 per cent of the calories in a day in the form of protein.

Recent research work, such as that undertaken by the Explorer Steffensen, when he lived for a year on a diet of meat, which, of course, furnished protein and fat, has seemed to show only that the larger amount is not harmful. We, however, recommend that the proportion of protein be kept moderate, as much for economic reasons as in the interests of health. Protein foods are more expensive than the so-called "energy" foods. The normal diet is so much more interesting and attractive when it is "balanced" with protein, fat and carbohydrates.

Just a word about the comparative value of vegetable and animal proteins. The latter are more efficient and while it is possible to get what we need from vegetables, our diet is too bulky unless milk is excepted from the class of animal proteins. So-called vegetarians usually admit milk, eggs and sometimes cheese to a place on the menu.

Pecan Pudding.

1 cup soft bread crumbs
2 cups scalded milk
1 tablespoon shortening
1 cup pecans (cut)

Mix bread crumbs, milk shortening, nuts, salt, egg yolks, sugar, juice and rind of lemon. When well blended, add raisins or dates. Mix thoroughly; then fold in whites of eggs. Pour into buttered individual molds and bake in a moderate oven, 375 degrees F., twenty to thirty minutes. Serve hot with cream.

Crab Bisque.

1 pint milk
1 slice onion
3 tablespoons butter
1½ tablespoons flour

Handling "Dead" Letters

The man who mails a letter inadvertently leaving both the address of the person to whom it is sent and his own address from the envelope no longer will have to wait six months for the letter's return. A new system of handling dead letters and packages, of course, provides that all first-class post offices will handle their own dead letters immediately, opening them to find the name of the sender if possible. Second, third and fourth-class offices will forward such undeliverable matter to some fifty odd dead letter offices provided for in new instructions. A delay of only 48 hours will be required under the new management.—Washington Star.

That's Right

A little boy was saying his prayers in a very low voice.

"I can't hear you, dear," his mother whispered.

"Wasn't talking to you," said the youngster firmly.

PRINCIPLE VS. INTEREST

A man in the "Near" East who had quite a reputation as a skinflint lost his pocketbook a while ago, with $200 in cash in it. He put an advertisement in the "Lost" column in the paper but a month elapsed and he had heard nothing on the subject. He had about given up all hope of ever seeing his $200 again when a farmer came in and returned the pocketbook. The skinflint looked in the pocketbook and found the money was all safe. The farmer thought perhaps the capitalist might give him a slight reward. On the contrary the skinflint gave him a sour look and said: "The money's all here, but where's the interest?"

MANY AND VARIED ARE THE BELIEFS COMMON TO MAN

The total number of superstitions is large and they vary with locality. But some of them are almost universal. Everybody knows it is bad luck, while walking under a ladder, to step into a coal hole in the sidewalk. Everybody knows bad luck may be averted if you knock on wood after making a rash statement. Everybody knows that it is unfortunate to see the new moon over the left shoulder—and lucky to catch its first beam over the right shoulder.

Perhaps not so many, even of the cautious ones, know that an umbrella should never be raised in the house, nor should one rock an unoccupied rocking chair. Entering a room by one door and leaving by another is unfortunate. Something is almost sure to happen.

Since the horse has almost retired from the scene, the good luck found in picking up a horse shoe has doubled. One should never pass up a shoe on the pavement now. Few experiences are more valuable.

And speaking of umbrellas, it is exceptionally bad luck to leave one in a church vestibule during the services. Probably such an act would be equally unfortunate if committed in the vestibule of a movie theater.

Recently a magazine published a score card by means of which you might learn just how superstitious you were. You put a cross in one of the squares when you recognized your own superstition. Some of the readers ran up as high as fifty.

It is often an omen of bad luck when some one leaves a cake of soap on the stairs, or when you miss the nail that is to be pounded and connect with the thumb, or when the children leave their little go-cart in the passage way you start through wrapped in thought. But apparently the worst of all luck is to be born under the wrong star. What is the use of struggling, when the stars in their courses fight against you? And yet, by the way, did you ever hear of a person with a decidedly bad horoscope? As a rule the stars do very well by us.—A. J. R. in the Minneapolis Journal.

Training's Great Value

The average man, in my view, is a pretty poor specimen, and the average intelligence, in my view, is very low. Is it realized that the first-class man can do something like five times the amount of work of the average man? That is not the product of inherent capacity by a long road. It is largely the product of early training.—Sir John Reith.

FIND HOLE IN PEAK

For years western mountaineers have talked about a "hole in a mountain." They said the passage was large enough to accommodate a load of hay, and pilots for one of the air lines recently substantiated the reports. The flyers identified the tunnel as a hole in Needle rock, a peak about 10,000 feet high.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Here's Quickest, Simplest Way to Stop a Cold

1. Take 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets.
2. Drink full glass of water. Repeat treatment in 2 hours.
3. If throat is sore, crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in a half glass of water and gargle according to directions in box.

Almost Instant Relief in this Way

The simple method pictured above is the way doctors throughout the world now treat colds.

It is recognized as the QUICKEST, safest, surest way to treat a cold. For it will check an ordinary cold almost as fast as you caught it.

Ask your doctor about this. And when you buy, see that you get the real BAYER Aspirin Tablets. They dissolve almost instantly. And thus work almost instantly when you take them. If you want to GET RID of Constipation worries-
Science says Today use a LIQUID Laxative
1. Control intestinal action exactly—no "purging"
2. Measure to suit your individual needs to the drop
3. Banish Bowel Fatigue and the laxative habit

Here's Why:
Any hospital offers evidence of the harm done by harsh laxatives that drain the system, weaken the bowel muscles, and in some cases even affect the liver and kidneys.
A doctor will tell you that the unwise choice of laxatives is a common cause of chronic constipation.
Fortunately, the public is fast returning to the use of laxatives in liquid form.
A properly prepared liquid laxative brings a perfect movement. There is no discomfort at the time and no weakness after. You don't have to take "a double dose" a day or two later.
In buying any laxative, always read the label. Not the claims, but the contents. If it contains one doubtful drug, don't take it.
Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a prescriptional preparation in which there are no mineral drugs. Its ingredients are on the label. By using it, you avoid danger of bowel strain. You can keep the bowels regular, and comfortable; you can make constipated spells as rare as colds.

The liquid test:
This test has proved to many men and women that their trouble was not "weak bowels", but strong cathartics:
First. Select a good liquid laxative. 2. Take the dose you find is suited to your system. 3. Gradually reduce the dose until bowels are moving regularly without any need of stimulation.
Syrup pepsin has the highest standing among liquid laxatives, and is the one generally used. It contains senna, a natural laxative which is perfectly safe for the youngest child. Your druggist has Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin.

Mud Lake Seen As Bird Sanctuary By Warden Quist

At a meeting on Tuesday of last week in St. Paul of district chief game wardens, at which Walter Quist of this district was present, state officials indicated there is a strong likelihood that the Mud lake are east of Holt will be designated as a bird sanctuary as a part of a federal program now getting under way.

Following a statement by Mr. Quist the Mud lake proposal was placed at the head of a list of several similar projects contemplated in the state. The federal government plans to acquire at a low cost tax delinquent and submarginal farm lands in the areas affected.

Mud lake has for the past few years been a place which no one has seemed to own, and if the government steps in now and clears titles it will be appreciated by all the surrounding land owners.

Free Licenses For Members Of Families Now Ready

Application for free drivers' licenses to family members can now be made at the office of A. C. Swandby, clerk of court, as a result of instruction received here this week from N. W. Elsberg, state highway commissioner. A charge of 10 cents is made for each of the licenses issued to those other than the heads of families.

Marshall county people will have to busy themselves within the next couple of weeks if they wish to drive their automobile after March 1, the final date permitted for people to drive a car without a drivers license, said Mr. Swandby.

The law requires that every person who drives an automobile shall take out a license. The licence fee is 25 cents, with an additional charge of 10 cents for handling the application. The 25 cent license fee applies only to the head of the family, but each driver who makes application, including the head of the family, must pay 10 cent service charge.

Only licenses to heads of families have been issued so far, and now other drivers in the family must make application for their licenses.

Here is the procedure:

Let us say that John Jones is head of the family, and that Mrs Jones and their sons, George and William, also are auto drivers. John has applied for and probably received his license' On the license he receives there has been stamped in the upper left hand corner a number. Now Mrs. Jones and the sons make out seperate applications for drivers' licenses. In their applications they give the license number on John's license as head of the family. A space is provided in the application blank for that purpose. Each must sign her or his application.

Then Mrs. Jones, George and William file their applications with the clerk of court, each paying only the service charge of 10 cents. Later the state highway department will mail separate licenses to Mrs. Jones and George and William.

Application blanks may be obtained for other members of the family at the time the head of the family files his own application, but the so-called "exempt" applications cannot be filed until the head of the family obtains his own license and ascertains his license number thereon.

Many drivers are delaying the filing of their application under the impression that they must obtain their 1934 car license before applying. Mr. Swandby said the car license number is not involved in any way with the drivers' license and persons may apply for the latter regardless of whether their cars carry 1933 or 1934 license plates.

Fab. 15 Last Day For Tags

Under the provisions of law, February 15 is the last day that motor vehicle owners may reregister their vehicles this year without penalty for delayed registration. The registrar has no authority to extend the time; therefore, since the legislature is not in session this year, there is no possibility of any such extension in 1934 as there was last year. Penalty for delayed registration will, therefore. begin February 16.

Let us all cooperate for the best of interests this year.

Credit Group Ready To Take Loan Applications

The Thief River Falls Production Credit association, a new loaning agency sponsored by the federal government, this week offers its services to farm borrowers of Pennington and nearby counties. In charge of the association's affairs will be R. J. Lund, who was named secretary-treasurer at an organization meeting on Monday last week. Alfred O. Clay of the Production Credit Corporation of St. Paul was present to assist in arranging details.

S. E. Hunt was named president and L. A. Nelson vice-president, while the board of directors includes the officers and Fred Erdman, Red Lake county; and Fred D. Voth and Oliver H. Nohre of Holt, Marshall county. Messrs. Hunt, Erdman and Voth comprise the executive committee.

While details are not yet entirely completed, Mr. Lund has announced that the association is prepared to receive applications for chattel loans from farmers in the territory served, which includes Pennington, Red Lake, Eastern Marshal, Roseau, Lake of the Woods and Northwest Beltrami counties.

Loans will be made on livestock, machinery and other personal property at a rate of approximately six per cent, and most of the loans will be made for twelve monhts or less, and in no case for more than three years. No loan will be made for less than $50, and each borrower will be required to buy stock in the association to the amount of five per cent of his loan.

Of the authorized capital stock of $60,000, the initial working capital of $25,000 is being provided thru the sale of the association's stock to the Production Credit corporation of St. Paul. The proceeds, represented by government bonds, is being deposited to the credit of the local group in the federal Intermediate Credit bank, where it will give the Thief River Falls association thru rediscounts a lending power of five times that amount or $125,000.

The local institution is one of thirty now being established thruout the state, and in view of the restriction in chattel loan operations by commercial banks in recent years, the federally sponsored associations are expected to render a genuine service to farmers in need of short-term loans.—Thief River Falls Times.

Rare Bird Found Recently In Roseau County

James Burress found a willow Ptarmigan frozen to death in the big swamp four miles northwest of Salol. This bird is rare in this state, this being the second bird found in Minnesote, according to authentic record, stated P. O. Fryklund.

The Willow Ptarmigan lives in the Arctic Circle. It is common in Norway and Sweeden and in in the northern part of Canada. It is the size of a pigeon, has a black tail, small black bill, black eyes, but its body is whiter than snow. Its feet look like that of a rabbit, being covered with fine feathers like fur.-Roseau Times.

President Roosevelt Tells Congress and Nation the New Deal Must Be Permanent—Russian Ambassador Presents His Credentials.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

JUST what President Roosevelt intends to do and what he wants congress to do was not revealed in any detail in the message which he read before a joint session of senate and house at the opening of the regular session. However, it was an excellent speech, addressed to the nation rather than to the congress and heard over the radio by millions of his fellow countrymen who should be encouraged by his general statement of progress made by the recovery administration and all the allied collectivist institutions.

President Roosevelt

In plain, forceful language, Mr. Roosevelt declared that the old methods have gone into the discard and that the new social and economic order upon the lines laid down by the national recovery legislation must be pushed forward and made lasting. Opposition to this, he asserted, is found among only a few individualists. In general terms he told of the success of the NRA in lessening unemployment, abolishing child labor, establishing uniform standards of hours and wages and preventing "ruinous rivalries within industrial groups."

The President's claim for farm relief will be questioned by many. Said he: "Actual experience with the operation of the agricultural adjustment act leads to my belief that thus far the experiment of seeking a balance between production and consumption is succeeding and has made progress entirely in line with reasonable expectations toward the restoration of farm prices to parity."

Brief allusion was made to the war debts, and it was stated that stabilization of the dollar is impossible at present because certain other nations are "handicapped by internal and other conditions." The message referred specifically to the disclosures before the senate banking and currency committee of rich and powerful financiers who "evaded the spirit and purpose of our tax laws," enriched themselves at the expense of their stockholders and the public and through reckless speculation with their own and other people's money, "injured the values of the farmers' crops and the savings of the poor." It also declared the intention of the government and the people to suppress "crimes of organized banditry, cold-blooded shooting, lynching and kidnaping that have threatened our security."

FOR the current and the next fiscal years the President asks congress to provide sixteen and a half billion dollars, in the budget message which was transmitted to the lawmakers. Of this immense sum the recovery agencies will require almost ten billions, the remainder being for the routine government establishment. For these two years the treasury deficits are estimated at nine billion three hundred million dollars. To meet these deficits the President proposes to borrow on the credit of the government ten billion dollars or more in addition to borrowing about twelve billions to refinance maturing government bonds and other obligations in the next year and a half.

By July 1, 1935, when the President proposes to halt recovery operations and begin paying the bills out of taxes, the public debt, he estimates, will stand at the all-time record peak of thirty-one billions eight hundred and thirty-four millions.

Republican senators and representatives and some Democrats professed to be appalled by the President's spending program, but it probably will be put through, just the same.

RECOGNITION of Russia was formally completed when Alexander A. Troyanovsky, the Soviet ambassador, arrived in Washington and presented his credentials to President Roosevelt at the White House. He brought with him several members of the embassy staff and as soon as the diplomatic procedure had been completed he eagerly got down to work on the matters of trade relations, credits and other questions with the officials of the State department.

Ambassador Troyanovsky

Mr. Troyanovsky was accompanied on his journey from Europe by William C. Bullitt, American ambassador to Moscow. At the Washington station he was welcomed by Jefferson Patterson and Robert F. Kelley of the State department, and by Toshihiko Taketomi, the Japanese charge d'affaires, a personal friend during the years when Troyanovsky was ambassador to Tokio. To reporters in New York the ambassador said he would work diligently for world peace, which may mean he will seek to negotiate with the United States a non-aggression pact such as the Soviet has with various European nations.

Mr. Bullitt, of course, reported directly to the President and also proceeded to organize his embassy staff and to discuss Russian affairs with Acting Secretary of State William Phillips. He said he hoped to start back to Moscow by February 1. Of Troyanovsky he said: "He is a swell fellow. You'll all like him."

JAMES L. DONNELLY, executive vice president of the Illinois Manufacturers' association, voices an opinion that is held by many who have hesitated to express it publicly. He asserts that the objectives of the President's recovery program are in danger of being defeated by the activities of leaders of organized labor.

"An examination of the record of organized labor since the adoption of the recovery program," he says, "indicates that its contribution has been definitely negative; that the policy of organized labor has reflected the selfish ambitions of its leaders rather than the welfare of the American workman."

He asserted that a recent survey made by his association and other industrial organizations in all parts of the country indicate that since the NRA was enacted approximately 1,200 strikes involving about 800,000 workers have occurred. These workers lost approximately 10,000,000 working days and wages amounting to more than $35,000,000, he said.

The American Federation of Labor, for its part, thinks the business prospects for 1934 are bright though overshadowed by the danger of inflation by fiat money. The organization estimates 6,400,000 persons have been put to work largely as a result of government measures, but adds that in November 10,702,000 workers remained unemployed and that civil works administration funds, giving temporary work to 4,000,000 persons, will be exhausted by February 15.

"In wages," it says, "there have been definite gains under codes for the lowest wage groups, but workers of average or higher wages have been forced to a lower living standard. Hourly wage rates average higher by 5½ cents per hour, but in many cases this is not enough to compensate for shorter hours, and in no case is it enough to compensate for higher prices.

"Millions who got jobs during the year are better off, but those who had jobs at more than a minimum have lost ground."

EARLE BAILIE, who has been acting as fiscal assistant to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, has resigned, and it is no secret that his retirement was the price paid for the unopposed confirmation of the appointment of Mr. Morgenthau by the senate. Certain members of the upper house, notably Senator Couzens, let the secretary know that they did not approve of the retention of Bailie, and Morgenthau told them Bailie had consented to help him temporarily and intended to quit soon. So the fiscal assistant wrote a nice letter saying that he would have to get back to New York to resume his work with the Seligman firm of investment bankers, and Morgenthau wrote the usual response accepting the resignation with regret.

Earle Bailie

It was Bailie's connection with the banking house that aroused the opposition to him. Senator Couzens had said openly that it was scandalous that there should be chosen for a high treasury post a partner of the Seligman firm.

CHICAGO'S milk supply was practically cut off by a strike of dairy farmers of that region who demand a higher price for their product. The controversy was complicated by the evident desire of the larger milk distributing companies of the city to drive out of business the smaller concerns that depend on "cash and carry" trade, and by the determination of the organized milk drivers not to accept reductions in pay. The farmers, thoroughly organized and ably directed, and the temporary idle drivers committed innumerable acts of violence and vandalism, almost with impunity. Milk trucks were burned or dumped in the river with their contents, and in at least one instance a train was stopped and robbed of a consignment of condensed milk. The farm administration officials were trying to effect a compromise.

SPEAKER RAINEY, after a conference at the White House, announced that President Roosevelt was making no out of town engagements for the period during which congress would be in session but would remain at his desk until adjournment. He added that the President hopes this will be early in the spring, as he believes the legislative program will be disposed of speedily.

BY A 5 to 4 vote the United States Supreme court sustained the constitutionality of the Minnesota emergency mortgage moratorium law which provides that, during the emergency declared to exist, courts might step in to halt or delay real estate mortgage sales and extend periods of redemption. This was held to foreshadow the probable stand of the court when other New Deal measures come up before it.

In another opinion the Supreme court held that Bishop James Cannon, Jr., and Miss Ada Burroughs, his secretary, must stand trial for conspiracy to violate the federal corrupt practices act during the campaign of 1928.

IN HIS efforts to save New York city from bankruptcy Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia asked the state legislature to pass a bill that would give him full control of the city's finances. But he ran into a snag at once, for Governor Lehman in a stinging letter told the mayor he would never approve such a measure which, he declared, would establish a fiscal and political dictatorship that he considered entirely unnecessary and essentially un-American. "No man in this country has ever asked for or received the dictatorial powers which would be yours through the enactment of this bill," the governor wrote.

Mayor La Guardia

Mayor La Guardia, who always has been a fighter, came back with a letter that bristled with references to the evils of the situation confronting the city, the hopelessness of trying to get assistance from the board of aldermen or putting piecemeal legislation through at Albany and accusations of political maneuvering by the governor.

"Your charge (of dictatorship) comes as a hollow mockery to the overburdened home owners, taxpayers, rent payers, and wage earners of the city of New York, who, for more than a decade, have suffered under as cruel and vicious a secret political dictatorship as has ever existed in an American community," Mayor La Guardia wrote.

WITH only five votes in opposition, the government's liquor tax bill, which is expected to add $470,000,000 to the national revenue, was passed by the house of representatives. Not one of more than a score of amendments altering the tax rates was accepted by the house and the measure, as finally passed, carried the same rates originally recommended by the ways and means committee.

A rigid requirement that all bottled liquor sold at retail must carry a federal stamp showing the government tax to have been paid and indicating the quantity and quality of the contents was written into the bill by the ways and means committee at the instance of the Treasury department.

As passed by the house, the bill imposes a tax of $2 a gallon on distilled spirits, $5 a barrel on beer and from 10 to 40 cents a gallon on wine. In addition to the aggregate 470 millions in revenue looked for from these domestic excise taxes, the committee expects 75 millions a year from the present import duties on foreign liquors and wines, bringing the total estimated revenue from liquor to 545 million dollars a year.

FRANCE enjoyed one of those great financial scandals not infrequent in these times, and the government of Premier Chautemps was endangered. Serge Stavisky, known as "Handsome Alex," had duped countless widows and orphans out of some sixty million francs through a Bayonne pawnshop swindle, and certain members of the cabinet were involved. Stavisky fled but was traced to a lonely villa at Chamounix, where two bullets in the head ended his life. The police said it was suicide, but the general belief was that the police shot the man so that the ministry could appear before the chamber of deputies with clean hands. The cleansing process was furthered by the enforced resignation of Albert Dalimier, minister of colonies.

PRESIDENT GRAU and his supporters in Cuba were preparing to combat an anti-government conspiracy which Secretary of the Interior Guiteras said had gone too far to be halted by any plan of political conciliation, or even recognition of the Grau regime by the United States. The revolutionists, he said, were operating from Miami, Fla. In Havana the army's home made tanks were placed in strategic positions, the police were armed with rifles and soldiers were stationed on housetops to check sniping.

President Grau

The Miami revolutionaries' plans "are too far advanced," Guiteras said, "because they accepted money from American corporations in exchange for certain concessions if they attain power. They can't return the money. Therefore, they must carry out their plans."

President Grau signed a decree setting April 22 as the date for the election of a constitutional assembly which will meet on May 20 to choose a new provisional president and draft a new constitution. Grau said he would not continue in the presidency after May 20, regardless of whether the assembly confirms him as provisional president.

Why Liquid Laxatives are Back in Favor

The public is fast returning to the use of liquid laxatives. People have learned that the properly prepared liquid laxative will bring a perfect movement without any discomfort at the time, or after.

The dose of a liquid laxative can be varied to suit the needs of the individual. The action can thus be regulated. A child is easily given the right dose. And mild liquid laxatives do not irritate the kidneys.

Doctors are generally agreed that senna is the best laxative for everybody. Senna is a natural laxative. It does not drain the system like the cathartics that leave you so thirsty. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a liquid laxative which relies on senna for its laxative action. It has the average person's bowels as regular as clockwork in a few weeks' time.

You can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drugstore, ready for use. Member N. R. A.

FORM OF HONOR FOR THE CHILD

Little children are born neither honest nor scrupulous about anybody's rights but their own. They have to be taught.

I wish there were another word for "scrupulous." But it has a definite shade of meaning that is not conveyed by "honest." It associates itself with actions and principles rather than things.

It is not difficult to teach a child honesty. By precept and example in the home and the general feel of honesty in the air, he can easily be taught never to touch or keep the smallest article belonging to another.

He can also be taught never to lie, although this is a more complicated matter. It is not so difficult, however, to understand the fairy tale fibs of children under five who are in the midst of imaginative development and often mistake their own conjurings for truth. However, this stage passes, and if care is taken not to frighten a child out of telling the truth, it is fairly easy to establish.

But daily in a child's life come up questions of "honor"—those subtle things not actually classed under honesty or truth. Unfortunately, his mother is not with him usually to guide him here, for it is after he starts to school and begins his real social contacts that temptation waits around the corner.

A boy peeps at another's paper and copies his work. Tommy sees the boy. He likes the boy and what he does is all right, surely, thinks Tom. He begins to exercise his own eyes and from that time on never loses a chance to crib when he can.

Another form of honor that I consider important is for children to cultivate the habit of never disparaging another child in his talk. A frank opinion is all right. But the deeper thrill of gossip, the desire to do another person damage is a bad trait.

Or to bootlick, to fawn over some one who can be of use, with utter sincerity. Opportunists are seldom scrupulous in the finer sense.

There we have it. Stealing other people's work, other people's good names, favors that don't belong to us. Three out of a thousand ways to be unscrupulous.—Olive Roberts Barton, in the New York World-Telegram.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of salvaging a long-sunken French corvette. The comte De Corlay and his son Robert claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A sailor, Sebastien, also is seeking the treasure. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay and Tom agree to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered. Doctor White arranges for a professional diver to go down to the hulk of the Fourquet. Next morning, the diver having failed to appear, Jessica dives and attaches a line to the Fourquet. Then Sebastien, with two companions, arrives. Doctor White tells him they have legally established a salvage claim, and Sebastien produces a revolver, apparently intent on killing both the girl and the doctor. Sebastien has succeeded in delaying the diver White had engaged. Tom and Robert discover his treachery and hasten to the location of the Fourquet.

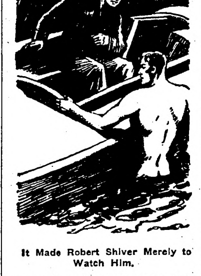
Somewhere just then, however, sounded a faint noise—an oar rolling as the dory swung in the long swell, perhaps. Tom located the sound as precisely ahead and started the motor. But scarcely had the propeller given its first kick when the exhaust of the boat ahead volleyed out not fifty yards away. It was not a loud concussion, scarcely more than a low bubbling, in fact, but at so close a range Tom felt sure that there was no danger of its being drowned again by the noise of his own motor.

The launch forged ahead. Tom had not wished previously to betray his position by the use of an electric torch, which at the best could not bore far into the dense concentrated mist. But he flashed it now and caught the dim glare of it against the dory. Fearing that it might serve as a target, Tom shut it off again—and at that moment his motor slowed, gave a strangling cough or two and stopped.

They heard a mocking laugh thrown into their very faces, it seemed. The moist sputterings ahead grew fainter, were dissolved and swallowed in the fog-filled distance. Tom, roaring imprecations, tugged vainly at the flywheel. It subbornly declined to budge. Rushing to the stern, Tom flashed his light down into the water. He saw the round cork floats and trailing folds of a torn old herring net.

Tom raised his head and groaned. Then, being a good sport at heart, he shut up suddenly, lighted a cigarette and sat down on the motor box. "Well, I guess that does it, Bob. We're wound up tighter than a bunny-hug in a few fathoms of fish net. Sebastien spread it to catch a dudfish and he's gone and done it."

There were no two ways about this. The small line of a lobster buoy is bad enough to wind up on a small boat's tail-shaft, but a fish-net is hopeless. Tom stripped, took his knife and slid over into the black icy water. It made Robert shiver merely to watch him. Even then it proved no easy job to hack and saw through the fine strands, so tightly were they wound.



It Made Robert Shiver Merely to Watch Him.

It was past one o'clock of a pitch black morning when Tom finished his task and got back into his clothes again. "The next time we go Sebastiening," he said, "we will get him where we find him, and quick."

"That might take a bit of doing, too," Robert opined. "Take a Miquelon fisherman trained to duck in and out of his hole in the wall, then give him a course of sub-chasing and mine-sweeping in and about Belle Isle and Quiberon, where for rocks the chart is like a chessboard with the pieces well scattered, and the game no different, then on top of that a post graduate course of longshore bootlegging, and you've got a downy bird that it isn't easy to take."

Tom nodded. "He was just having fun with me. He's got hep that you and your father are on the ground and he doesn't mean to fool away any more time. He'd better not, either, or we're apt to get around there and find that Sebastien has sucked the eggs. He's heading that way right now."

"I fancy you're right, Tom. Well, then, the good old Fourquet is lying plump on the Corvette ledge, a little more than two-thirds out on a line from the Whale to the black buoy."

"Wha—at?"

"Right, old chap. I've sounded her out so that I could make a drawing of her to scale. She's precisely where my august ancestor charted her. Sebastien must know that. Anyhow, he could guess, because there's a patch of algae that you can see at low tide, smack over her."

"But—hold on, Bob. If she hit the ledge—"

"She didn't," Robert interrupted. "She hit MacFarlane's ledge, about a quarter of a mile to the north'ard, then drifted out with the tide, sinking. She rolled over on the Corvette ledge and stuck there. Sebastien must have heard all that through the speaking tube when papa and I discussed it aboard my hooker. But he wanted to verify it, just as we did."

"Then what on earth were you and your father up to yesterday?" Tom demanded.

"We wanted to get a bearing on the spot from the shore, so that we could determine it at night from a dim light in the rocks. Mine-laying methods. I'm a bit of a crack at that game."

"Well," said Tom, slowly, "this sure saves me days and days of fruitless toil. I stood about as much chance of finding her as I would of finding palm trees at the North pole. Then that's where Sebastien is digging out for now."

"I should say so. This black bean soup is just his affair. His sort of johnny is a combination of shark, seal and sea gull."

"Well, then let's fire up and go along, too," Tom said.

"Hadn't we better wait for daylight?"

"Reckon there's no need. I know my own front yard. We'll take it easy so's not to hit anything too hard."

"But we shall have to get a compass."

"Don't need it. More apt to put you off, rock dodgin' in a little boat."

He started the engine and slowed it. At a speed of about four miles an hour they started to poke their way through the impenetrable murk. The breakers that lash perpetually, fair weather and foul, across the fearful rocks of Pemaquid point were their most pressing menace, but the long fore-reaching ground swell served as a guide of direction. Tom stopped twice to listen to the growl. Then a light blurred through the fog, and the audible warnings guided them.

An hour passed. The faintest light was by this time beginning to infuse the gloom. Tom raised the boat's speed to its normal and headed for what he correctly reckoned to be the entrance to the Gut.

The dawn was coming steadily, and presently they saw through the whitening mist the trees on either side of the narrowing entrance. Several minutes later the drab sides of houses appeared just ahead. Tom glided up to the float of a gasoline station, and as he did so received a shock. For on the other side of it lay a big heavy yawl-rigged boat, her square stern projecting toward him, and across this was painted in dingy lettering: "Annie M," and beneath it, Friendship, Me.

CHAPTER IX

But this was not all. As they drifted in, a swarthy, shock-headed man came out of the cabin holding in his grimy paws a diver's helmet, and as Tom's wild glare fastened upon this headgear he discovered that the front of it was shattered. The man holding it, a Portuguese, looked at Tom and gave a sort of despairing bleat. "Look-a-dere—" he mailed. "Whatta—?"

In two leaps Tom was aboard the yawl and feverishly dragging out the astounding story. Mike had left Friendship early in the evening on a hurry call to do a diving job for the doctor on Whale island, whose launch—or something of that sort—had sunk. Fearing that he had figured too closely on the requisite gas, Mike put into New Harbor after more, to be on the safe side. A Frenchman he met there had asked for a ride around to Bristol, with which request Mike obligingly had complied. He now believed the man to be a crook, and fugitive from justice.

A little way out from New Harbor they had been followed by a launch, whereat the passenger had seemed very frightened. He had taken the wheel and given their pursuer the slip in the fog, then offered Mike five dollars to take him back to New Harbor. Again Mike complied, glad to be rid of his suspicious passenger.

And now, on his arrival, when starting to overhaul his gear he had discovered what looked like sabotage, though utterly unable to conceive of any motive for such an act. The mysterious Frenchman had been friendly and agreeable. He claimed to be the owner of a Nova Scotia halibuter that had been driven down by a gale and put in to caulk her leaking seams. Why smash the helmet?

"THAT Miss Dresden was calling again," announced Bob Williams at the Omega Chi fraternity house addressing some of the group gathered around the large fireplace in the main hall just before dinner. "You know, she's the old girl that wants our old clothes. Miss Dresden—Elsie Dresden—ouch!"

No one was especially interested, nor especially concerned. The name suggested to them all a rather dried-up spinster, of which the college town had plenty. This particular one happened to be interested in an industrial mission. The mission, she said, needed all the old clothes they could get. They sold the garments at a very small price to the men who applied for help and shelter. Sometimes, she said, all the men needed to get back on their feet again was a decent suit of clothes. It was hard to get old clothes. And it had occurred to her that the men at the fraternity houses would have lots of clothes to discard before they were really at all badly worn.

No one thought enough more about it to get together anything for the industrial mission. Then one afternoon at about five, when Bob Williams was reclining very comfortably before the open fire, Miss Dresden drew up in her flivver and with jaunty self-assurance walked to the front door of the fraternity house and rang the bell. As was the custom, Bob Williams, being nearest the front door, opened it, and straightway he knew that this Elsie Dresden was a very welcome number.

She had come for the clothes, she told him. The industrial mission was her pet charity. She and her grandmother, she explained, had not lived in town long and they felt that they were fortunate to have such an interesting cause to work for.

"I'm mighty sorry," Bob Williams told her, "that we haven't anything ready now, but I'm sure we will have tomorrow. Can you call, or shall I or one of the other men bring them around?"

"I'll call," smiled Elsie brightly, and Bob found himself smiling rather eagerly back at her.

After she had gone he explained and likewise assured the brothers, one and all, that it was their duty to produce something or other for the bundle for the industrial mission.

Ronald Price was responsible for the package that followed, but he never would have thought of it if it had not been that Bob Williams insisted that Ronald should donate his old raincoat and his second pair of shoes, not to mention all the neckties he owned but two, and all his winter underclothes to the cause. "You're a senior," Bob told him. "You'll soon be earning money and you can buy some more by the time winter comes around."

So the bundle was assembled. Ronald took upon his shoulders the task of packing it up, and the next afternoon Bob waited to be able to give it to Miss Dresden when she called. He asked if he could not go with her to the mission—so he could help carry the bundle—and before he had left her he had dated her up for the next Saturday night house dance.

That night Bob discovered that his spring suit—the only suit he owned beside the one he was wearing and his tuxedo—had disappeared from his closet. Ronald Price said that it seemed only fair. He had sent Ronald's suit.

Bob Williams made no comment, but the next morning early he found his way to the industrial mission. A brisk looking white-haired lady, apparently rather near-sighted in spite of thick-lensed glasses, was at the desk in the reception room. Ranged on books and hangers behind her and around the room were various suits, coats, hats, etc.

"Is there something I can do for you, young man?" she said, and right away Bob knew she was Elsie's grandmother. "We have some rather nice things this morning."

This was an opportunity, thought Bob. It would be easier getting his suit back this way then by explaining the prank and making himself out an Indian giver.

"I was looking for a suit, so's I could go to work," said Bob with assumed wistfulness. "The one I'm wearing is borrowed." Bob hated to lie to a lady, but the situation seemed to warrant the falsehood.

With a little maneuvering he picked out his own suit and retired to another room to try it on. The kind old lady insisted that a dollar was quite ample pay for it and threw in a half dozen rather good second-hand ties and some shirts into the bargain.

Later when Elsie Dresden knew Bob much better she told how she had first begun really to admire him when he gave an almost new suit to the industrial mission. Her grandmother had told her that she let a very poor young man have it—a poor down-and-out fellow who was trying to get a job.

And even after they were engaged Bob did not tell Elsie Dresden the truth of the matter. And he is wondering whether it is one of the confessions he ought to make before they are married at the altar.

MONOXIDE GAS DANGER

The winter months usually bring an increase in the deaths due to carbon monoxide poisoning, the national safety council points out in warning to motorists to be especially careful during the cold season. The odorless, tasteless and invisible gas is particularly dangerous in a closed garage, and many car owners have met death by running the engine while the garage doors were closed. On the highway, too, carbon monoxide takes a heavy toll, seeping into the tightly closed car when the exhaust pipe becomes choked. This hazard has become more prevalent with the popularity of closed types of vehicles. The council points to 608 fatalities from the insidious gas, a rise of nearly 400 per cent in eight years.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

The other day a little circular came to my attention and I felt it was so good that I must pass it on. It contained the following:

I inspire respect and admiration.
I help everybody.
Everybody loves me.
I create friendship for you
Good Will for your business.
I violate no law.
I am infectious as laughter.
Many have praised, none have condemmed me.
I cost you nothig save when you ignore me.
Then you lose friend, opportunity, wealth and happiness.
I am that little trait called—Courtesy.

That Mr. Driver, is the answer. I think if we apply a little more courtesy to driving, walking, talking, and in our general business affairs, we will all live longer and safer.

The Weather

The weather was nice here all week up to late Tuesday evening. Then a strong northwest wind set in and it cooled off pretty fast. Wednesday was windy and snappy all day.

A Country Editor Looks at Banking

THE editor of the Norwalk, Ohio, Herald takes a somewhat different view of the banking situation from a good many people. His idea is as follows:

"With rents falling and unpaid, real estate does not present a happy picture. Nor does the owner of carefully selected bonds feel any happier, with a bunch of them going wrong. A lot of folks very carefully invested in preferred and common stocks in the finest companies in the world and have seen them fall to perhaps a tenth of what they paid for them, and no dividends at all. Some folks kept their money in savings accounts in banks, and some banks have closed and left them high and dry. But the situation is worth looking at very carefully.

"On government authority, most banks that closed were really solvent but for frozen assets and popular timidity. Gradually the closed banks are coming out from under and depositors in even bad cases will get at least 0 per cent of their savings. That's tough of course; nobody likes to lose half of what they had scrimped and sacrificed and saved. But when you hoard and stick the roll of bills in a coffee pot or under a mattress, some plug-ugly comes along and burns your feet till you tell him to take it and welcome.

"And what about the great majority of banks that weathered the storm, met all comers and are doing business as usual, carefully and conservatively, but safely? What about the savings in those banks? They are a full 100 per cent today—and they are the only thing we know of at 100 per cent anywhere. After all is said and done, a good, well managed bank is still the best place in all the world for money or savings. Right now in Ohio the banks pay the taxes on all savings and pay their depositors net interest on their savings. We can't think, just now, of many other investments that are a tenth as safe as a savings account in a solid bank.

Army Mule Losing Out

The army mule, though more than holding its own in difficult country, is elsewhere fighting a losing battle against the machine age. Hard-kicking hoofs are yielding to balloon tires and the cynical bray of yesteryear is being replaced by the purr of well-oiled motors which are not subject to arbitrary balking.

The two regiments of regular infantry forming the First brigade of the First division have been equipped with motor trucks and motor cycles, utility cars and truck trailers. And now the field and combat trains of the Sixteenth and Eighteenth infantry regiments, stationed respectively at Governors Island and Fort Hamilton, are to be motorized.

Temptation for Pepys

Black Monday was surely as nothing to the Tuesday that follows an Easter bank holiday, writes a columnist in the Manchester (Eng.) Guardian. Mr. Pepys felt the strain of it even under the easier conditions of the Seventeenth century. "To the office," he recorded on the Tuesday of Easter week, 1660, "but, Lord, what a conflict I had with myself, my heart tempting me a thousand times to go abroad about some pleasure or other."

CONGRESSMEN SEEN AS HARD WORKERS

Banker Tells of Labor Put in by Members of Congress on Mass of Technical Measures

OUTLINING legislative procedure, Robert V. Fleming, President Riggs National Bank, Washington, D. C., gave the recent convention of the American Bankers Association a description of the difficulties and problems confronting the law-makers. Mr. Fleming said in part:

"The most important part of organization of the two branches of congress is election of standing committees. There are 34 standing committees in the Senate and 46 in the House. These are the workshops of Congress and the real work of lawmaking is done in Committees.

"The task of legislating for 124,000,000 people is a tremendous one. Of recent years approximately 20,000 bills are introduced annually in the two Houses. Only a small percentage become law, but they must be weighed in committee, accepted or rejected, perhaps amended, reported out, and then considered on the floor.

"Lawmaking involves about 99% of hard and unspectacular work and about 1% of oratory. Few tasks appear so easy and are so difficult as enactment of sound and satisfactory legislation. Few individuals in any line of activity work harder or longer hours than the chairmen of the important committees during a session. I have great sympathy for the members of Congress whose constituents expect undivided attention to every piece of legislation in which they may be interested. From my personal observation, they earnestly and conscientiously endeavor to do all that is possible.

Public Hearings

"When a bill is introduced, referred to committee and printed, the next step, if it is a measure of considerable importance, is to conduct a public hearing. The committee makes an effort to listen to anyone who cares to be heard either for or against a measure, although witnesses are frequently limited as to time. Members of the Cabinet and other officials of the administrative departments of the Government usually testify on measures in which they are interested and furnish the committee information in executive session or otherwise.

"Due to pressure of work and the fact that it is impossible for members of Congress to be technical experts on every subject of legislation, the committees are inclined to give consideration to the merits of arguments presented in testimony and the recommendations of the Cabinet and other officials. It is therefore highl desirable, both from the standpoint of Congress as well as those affected by proposed legislation, that the latter have an opportunity to discuss frankly the effects of such legislation."

Scripture Proves Horse Was Known to Egyptians

The Egyptians were warriors from the beginning of their history, and had horses in numbers as early as when Joseph was laying in grain during the seven years of plenty before the coming of the famine years, for we are distinctly told that he gave out "bread for horses" (Genesis 47:17) when the people were giving everything they had in exchange for food. Jacob knew horses, too, and the troubles they were subject to when before his death in Egypt he described Dan as an adder "that biteth the horses' heels" (Genesis 49:17) referring to the serpent called the ceastes, which lurks in camel tracks on desert sand trails. The book of Exodus (chapter 14) gives us a vivid account of Pharaoh's 600 horse-drawn chariots, and his cavalry being overthrown and drowned in the Red sea.

Trace Troubled Dreams to Prehistoric Period

When a man dreams that he is falling he never strikes bottom because his monkey ancestors who fell from their perches in the forest and failed to hook their tails over the limb of a tree during the descent never lived so that their human descendants could remember crashing to the ground. And if a man dreams that he suddenly awoke unclad in a room full of people, that, too, is a carry-over from prehistoric times, when man went about unclothed.

So believes Prof. William E. Slaght, who for a quarter of a century studied dreams. He analyzed thousands of dreams, seeking to find their origin, and generally was able to trace them either to hereditary causes, such as the monkey falling from the tree, or to some vivid experience in the past life of the dreamer.

In his "Before Adam" Jack London added that just because the dreamer woke up, even if sweating and in a fright, proved that he had survived the fall.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Old English Saying

"What an ado they made about it," we hear. An ado is commonly understood to signify a "fuss," whether this is the nature of actual disturbance, or merely the phychological "fuss" of resentment and hurt feelings. The term doubtless owes its familiarity and its popularity in common speech to the title of Shakespeare's play, "Much Ado About Nothing." But the origin of its use in this way goes back a bit further.

It was the old English author, Thomas Preston, whose activity is dated at about 1561, three years before Shakespeare was born, who first wrote of "making an ado" in the first part of his "King Cambyses."

Incidentally, "ado" is from the Middle English "at do," which was the northern form for "to do."

National Anthem

"The Star-Spangled Banner" was made the national anthem of the United States by act of congress, signed by the President, March 3, 1931. Prior to this its only official recognition occurred nearly a hundred years after it was written, when it was formally ordered to be played in the army and navy on occasions of ceremony. Its standing was undisputed in other lands, and whenever America was honored in music this air was played.

Persimmon American Fruit

The persimmon is a native fruit and grows wild throughout the eastern United States from Connecticut to the Carolinas and westward to Missouri and Arkansas. The American persimmon is a close relative of the Japanese persimmon, or date-plum, which came originally from China. This tree bears a larger and much less astringent fruit than the American species and is more tropical, having been grown successfully in southern California.

Earliest Periodicals

The beginning of the periodical was in the Seventeenth century, when in 1646 catalogues of books were introduced. In 1655 the Journal des Scavans was printed in France, and in the same year Acta Philosophica. These might be said to be the parents of the periodical. In 1709 the Tatler was established, 1711 the Spectator, 1712 the Guardian and 1710 the Examiner. In 1762 the North Briton appeared and in 1731 the Gentleman's Magazine. It was in imitation of the latter magazine that Benjamin Franklin founded the General Magazine in Philadelphia. One of the most notable early attempts of the publication of the magazine in this country was the Pennsylvania Magazine, 1775-6. This was the joint work of Robert Aikin and Thomas Paine.

Heavy Stocks of Meat Products In Packers' Hands

Effort Being Made to Reduce Supplies Before Processing Tax Goes Into Effect

In spite of the fact that this is the period when meat stocks should be at the lowest point of the year and a time when accumulation of stocks should begin, packers' shelves are heavily laden with pork, lard, and other meats, says the weekly market bulletin issued by the Central Co-Operative Association, South Saint Paul.

On October 1, this year, there were 628,965,000 pounds of pork in storage houses of the United States, compared with only 498,253,000 pounds a year earlier. This shows a 27% increase over a year ago, and compared with the five year average for that date, it is a 24% increase.

Lard stocks on October 1 were 192,502,000 pounds, or 171% greater than the light stocks a year ago, at 70,656,000 pounds, and 101% greater than the five year average.

The significant factor in the storage figures on October 1 is that they show a substantial reduction compared with September 1 this year. Evidently a process of liquidation has been going on in packing centers in an effort to reduce their stocks of meat before the processing tax is put into effect. Pork stocks fell off 127,736,000 pounds, or 17% during that month, with a reduction of 31,074,000 pounds, or 14%, being noted in lard stocks.

The tax to be put into effect on and after November 5 will be placed on all packers' stocks as well as on live hogs. On pork products the tax will be ½c per pound, and according to the October 1 figures, this would cost packers approximately $4,000,000.

Following the publication of Secretary Wallace's Corn-Hog program which involves a processing tax on hogs, hog prices declined sharply. This, apparently, indicates that packers are not in a mood to take unnecessary chances of laying in a big supply of expensive pork, before November 5. Men in the trade feel that this has been a big factor in reducing hog prices during the last two or three weeks.

NEW BULLETINS AID CUT-OVER FARMERS

Farmers in Minnesota's cut-over country, who are interested in cheaper ways to clear land, or in planning the organization of their farms so as to get the most income from them, should not miss seeing two new bulletins issued by the Minnesota Agricultural Experiment Station. Both publications are free and copies may be obtained from county agents, or by writing the Bulletin Office, University Farm, St. Paul.

Bulletin 290, "Costs of Clearing Land on Minnesota Farms," reports a cooperative study between the division of agricultural engineering Minnesota Agricultural Experiment Station, and the agricultural engineering bureau of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. M. J. Thompson, L. H. Schoenleber and N. A. Kessler are authors.

The bulletin is based on the results obtained by 122 farmers in 11 counties in clearing 371 acres of stumps and stones. It shows the labor and material required for clearing each of the four major types of soils fit for farming, including sand, sandy loam, clay loam and clay, each with its typical forest cover. The costs are reported under four separate headings - brushing, stumping, breaking and picking stones and roots.

Bulletin 295, "Planning Farm Organizations for the Northeast Cut-Over Section of Minnesota," reports another cooperative study, between the Minnesota Experiment Station, represented by George A. Pond of the agricultural economics division and the U. S. Department of Agriculture, represented by C. W. Crickman, of the bureau of agricultural economics.

Primarily, this bulletin is intended to acquaint the reader with the problems peculiar to the cut over country and to show how any farmer may plan his own situation so as to make the most of whatever he has. Along with general study and observation of the region, the authors have based their statements on a special farm management study conducted on a group of farms in the Askov community and on such governmental and other facts and figures as are periodically available for the region.

OAT YIELD NETS 777 BUSHELS ON 15 ACRES EACH TWO YEARS

Ellendale—A strange coincidence, one that would probably happen only once in a lifetime, was discovered with the threshing on the Emanuel Christensen farm near Ellendale last week. In 1932 Christensen planted 15 acres of barley and oats, taking off a yield of 777 bushels. This year, on a different field but with the same number of acres planted to the same grains, Christensen's yield was also exactly 777 bushels. Although this year the general grain yield was poorer than in 1932, the 15 acres this year was planted on low ground, which accounts for the exceptionally good yield.

LEATHER NECKTIES ARE LATEST WEARING APPAREL

Faribault—A new business of making leather neckties for sale has been started by two Faribault young men. Four-in-hands and bow ties are made of calf leather, and the creators claim that these new ties put their silk and satin relatives to shame. The principal advantage the young men claim, is that they are immune to soup and spaghetti stains, for a drop of water or gasoline will remove spots in short order. The "factory" is a small house located in Milwaukee.

Through refinancing their businesses from the new federal farm loans, farmers in many instances are improving their circumstances, especially as many creditors are scaling down their debts in order to receive cash payments. A commissioner's loan of $2,500 made to a farmer in Minnesota recently paid off a loan of $2,906, other indebtedness amounting to $54.20, and taxes of $148.53. This farmer secured a scale-down in his debts of approximately $638, a slight reduction in interest and had funds left for farm operations during the current year.

How many mothers have warned little children about gas stoves or the danger of any stove?

Recently a little boy two years old reached for a coffee urn and the contents were spilled over his head.

Doctors are doing everything possible to save his eyesight, but the burns were so severe that the child, no doubt, will be blind for life. Other serious accidents of burning, scalding, and fire have occurred when children were allowed to get in and around stoves while meals were being prepared.

President Roosevelt Tells Congress and Nation the New Deal Must Be Permanent—Declares Recovery Policies Are Succeeding.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

President Roosevelt

JUST what President Roosevelt intends to do and what he wants congress to do was not revealed in any detail in the message which he read before a joint session of senate and house at the opening of the regular session. However, it was an excellent speech, addressed to the nation rather than to the congress and heard over the radio by millions of his countrymen who should be encouraged by his general statement of progress made by the recovery administration and all the allied collectivist institutions.

In plain, forceful language, Mr. Roosevelt declared that the old methods have gone into the discard and that the new social and economic order upon the lines laid down by the national recovery legislation must be pushed forward and made lasting. Opposition to this, he asserted is found only among a few individualists. In general terms he told of the success of the NRA in lessening unemployment, abolishing child labor, establishing uniform standards of hours and wages and preventing "ruinous rivalries within industrial groups."

The President's claim for farm relief will be questioned by many. Said he: "Actual experience with the operation of the agricultural adjustment act leads to my belief that thus far the experiment of seeking a balance between production and consumption is succeeding and has made progress entirely in line with reasonable expectations toward the restoration of farm prices to parity."

Brief allusion was made to the war debts, and it was stated that stabilization of the dollar is impossible at present because certain other nations are "handicapped by internal and other conditions." The message referred specifically to the disclosures before the senate banking and currency committee of rich and powerful financiers who "evaded the spirit and purpose of our tax laws," enriched themselves at the expense of their stockholders and the public and through reckless speculation with their own and other people's money, "injured the values of the farmers' crops and the savings of the poor." It also declared the intention of the government and the people to suppress "crimes of organized banditry, cold-blooded shooting, lynching and kidnaping that have threatened our security."

The President's closing sentences especially aroused the supporters of the Constitution. He thanked the members of congress for their co operation and concluded:

"Out of these friendly contacts we are, fortunately, building a strong and permanent tie between the legislative and executive branches of the government.

"The letter of the Constitution wisely declared a separation, but the impulse of common purpose declares a union. In this spirit we join once more in serving the American people."

THIS message of the President was addressed especially to the American people. A few days before he delivered another that was meant more for the rest of the world. It was his speech on Woodrow Wilson's birthday delivered at a dinner given by the Woodrow Wilson foundation, and in it he vigorously attacked political leaders of other nations for frustrating the hopes of the people for world peace. Ninety per cent of the population of the earth, he averred, is desirous that there shall be no more wars; but the remaining 10 per cent are misleading politicians who have imperialistic designs and selfish motives.

Mr. Roosevelt's peace plan, offered to the world, may be thus summarized:

Every nation would agree to eliminate over a period of years and by progressive steps all weapons of offense, keeping only permanent defensive implements. Each nation could inspect its neighbor to insure against offensive weapons.

Every nation would join in a simple declaration that no armed forces would be allowed to cross its borders into the territory of any other nation.

By ruling that such pacts would be effective unless all nations agreed the nations still believing "in the use of the sword for invasion" would be pointed out to the pressure of world opinion.

The President also proclaimed a modification of the Monroe Doctrine, asserting that it would henceforth be the policy of the United States to undertake no single-handed armed intervention in any of the American republics. He declared that it was the joint obligation of all those republics to intervene in any one of them if such interference should become necessary to protect their interests.

FOR the current and the next fiscal years the President asks congress to provide sixteen and a half billion dollars, in the budget message which was transmitted to the lawmakers. Of this immense sum the recovery agencies will require almost ten billions, the remainder being for the routine government establishment. For these two years the treasury deficits are estimated at nine billion three hundred million dollars. To meet these deficits the President proposes to borrow on the credit of the government ten billion dollars or more in addition to borrowing about twelve billions to refinance maturing government bonds and other obligations in the next year and a half.

By July 1, 1935, when the President proposes to halt recovery operations and begin paying the bills out of taxes, the public debt, he estimates, will stand at the all-time record peak of thirty-one billions eight hundred and thirty-four millions.

Republican senators and representatives and some Democrats professed to be appalled by the President's spending program, but it probably will be put through, just the same.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT announced that he had accepted the long expected resignation of William H. Woodin as secretary of the treasury, and appointed Henry Morgenthau, Jr., to succeed him. Mr. Morgenthau took the oath of office on New Year's day in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt and the members of his own family.

Mr. Woodin's retirement had been expected since last summer. He is still in Arizona endeavoring to recover his health.

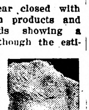
PRESIDENT GRAU and his supporters in Cuba were preparing to combat an anti-government conspiracy which Secretary of the Interior Guiteras said had gone too far to be halted by any plan of political conciliation, or even recognition of the Grau regime by the United States. The revolutionists, he said, were operating from Miami, Fla. In Havana the army's home made tanks were placed in strategic positions, the police were armed with rifles and soldiers were stationed on housetops to check sniping.

President Grau

The Miami revolutionaries' plans "are too far advanced," Guiteras said, "because they accepted money from American corporations in exchange for certain concessions if they attain power. They can't return the money. Therefore, they must carry out their plans."

President Grau signed a decree setting April 22 as the date for the election of a constitutional assembly which will meet on May 20 to choose a new provisional president and draft a new constitution. Grau said he would not continue in the presidency after May 20, regardless of whether the assembly confirms him as provisional president.

THOUGH the year closed with prices for farm products and manufactured foods showing a downward trend; though the estimates of the government and of grain dealers revealed that the acreage reduction on which the Agricultural department spent vast sums was virtually a failure, and though there were other discouraging signs, on the whole President Roosevelt and his advisers had reason to believe the new year promised to see considerable success achieved by their recovery plans. Many leaders in economy and politics gave them this assurance, and there was manifested a general determination to go along further with the President and support his efforts.



Speaker Rainey

Speaker Rainey predicted that the session of congress would be harmonious.

"We are going to have a short and constructive session," said Mr. Rainey. "It will be a very important session, but a working one rather than a dramatic one. We will pass the supply bills, the tax bills and the liquor measures and adjourn early in May.

"There will be no attempt to overthrow the recovery program or to oppose the President. It isn't possible. If there is any sniping the snipers are apt to be left at home.

"We had the extra session and enacted the recovery program and it is just beginning to work. Recovery is on the way."

TORRENTIAL rains lasting many hours wrought disaster in Los Angeles and its suburbs for floods rushed through the towns and countryside and probably 75 or more lives were lost. Glendale, Montrose, La Crescenta, Echo Park, Long Beach, Alamitos Beach, Venice, Redondo Beach and other towns were those in the direct path of the inundation. It was in these places that the heaviest toll of life occurred.

DEVALUATION of the dollar appears to be a certainty of the not distant future, and the Treasury department is getting ready for that step. To start with, it is about to seize all remaining private holdings of gold. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., now secretary, in an order issued under the emergency banking law, demanded the surrender of all gold holdings, with five specific exceptions, regardless of their size.

Failure to follow the treasury's order and conviction carries a maximum penalty of ten years in prison, $10,000 in fines, or both. The order applies to corporations, partnerships, and associations as well as individuals.

One important exception which still blocks the way to devaluation was left in the new gold order. Federal reserve banks, which own $3,700,000,000 in gold and gold certificates out of a total American gold stock of $4,300,000,000, were still allowed to keep their gold. How to deprive the reserve banks of this gold legally, or at least of the profit which the banks would otherwise reap from devaluation, has long been puzzling treasury legal experts.

NOW it is up to the United States Court of Claims to decide whether or not President Roosevelt's action in removing William E. Humphrey as a member of the federal trade commission last October was "illegal and void." Mr. Humphrey has filed with the court a petition demanding from the United States $1,251.39 which he says is due him as his salary from October 8 to November 30. He laid before the court a transcript of four letters from the President. Two of them requested his resignation, a third accepted his resignation, although Mr. Humphrey contended, none had been offered, while a fourth contained only these words:

W. E. Humphrey

"I am in receipt of your letter of September 27. Effective as of this date (October 7) you are hereby removed from the office of commissioner of the federal trade commission."

Mr. Humphrey refused to resign or get out, and formally notified the trade commission of this refusal; but the commission wrote him that it had voted to recognize the executive order of the President. Mr. Humphrey is a Republican and the controversy between him and Mr. Roosevelt has been taken up as a political issue by some others of that party. It is certain to be the subject of oratory and argument in congress. For fourteen years Mr. Humphrey represented the state of Washington in congress, and he was appointed to the trade commission by President Coolidge in 1925 and reappointed by President Hoover in 1931.

SOME weeks ago Jon G. Duca, premier of Rumania, outlawed the Iron Guard, an anti-Jewish organization. He has paid the penalty, for a member of the guard assassinated him in a railway station in Sinaia. The murderer, who was arrested with two accomplices, proudly admitted his crime.

The assassination came as a climax to a long series of disorders characteristic of the new wave of anti-Semitic radicalism which has swept Rumania since the victory of Chancellor Hitler's anti-Jewish campaign in Germany.

RADICALS in Argentina attempted a revolt at Rosario and Santa Fe, in the northern part of the country, attempting to prevent the forthcoming elections. But the authorities were alert and suppressed the uprising. The mounted police fired on the crowds and a score or more of the reds were killed and many wounded when they attacked the arsenals and police headquarters.

CARY N. WEISINGER, JR., deputy administrator in charge of the banking code, was fired by General Johnson because he was held responsible for the issue of a press release inferring that Johnson had approved a proposed set of fair banking practice rules that some 700 banks and clearing houses were about to adopt. Johnson suspended the proposed fee schedules, stating that he had never seen them.

Winter steer feeding trials conducted over a period of eleven years at the Northwest School and station at Crookston have demonstrated that with an abundance of common cheap feeds, steers can be profitably fattened in this region under normal market conditions. During this period more than 300 beef cattle have been experimentally fed under the direction of O. M, Kiser, animal husbandman, in cooperation with the Division of Animal Husbandry, Minnesota Experiment Station.

Results have been obtained on many different feed rations that are common on farms in Northwestern Minnesota. An acceptable basal ration for fattening, baby beef calves is ground barley, alfalfa or sweet clover hay and oilmeal. The oilmeal can be fed to the extent of 10 percent of the grain ration or at rate of 1.5 pounds per head daily. When barley is replaced with an equal weight of oats, the rate of grain is lowered; however, if oats undersell barley, pound for pound, by an appreciable difference, it would be desireable to replace part of the barley with oats.

Wheat has been used quite satisfactorily as the grain for fattening cattle. Wheat in the trials has been fed alone, ground, and fed in combination with ground barley or ground oats. Whether or not wheat can be fed to advantage depends more on its cost per 100 pounds as compared with the cost of barley than upon any other factor.

Variable results have been obtained from the use of rye in the beef cattle feeding trials. In one trial, rye of good quality was used in which the ergot content was five-tenths of one percent. Cattle fed this grain made a poor showing in comparison with cattle fed other grains. In another trial, rye containing but four to six hundreths of one percent of ergot gave satisfactory results in comparison with other grains.

Detailed information on the beef cattle feeding trials can be obtatned in bulletin and mimeograph form by addressing the Northwest School & Station.

What do you do for frost bites? What are the symptoms of frost bite?

The affected part of the body become painfully cold and then suddenly the sense of feeling in the part is gone. The affected part becomes white or grayish white in color.

Keep the patient away from fire or warmly heated room.

Apply palm of hand, wool or fur to affected pat.

Massage the parts very gently then apply cold water.

Apply ointment as you would to a burn because frostbite is the same in affect.

The object of the treatment is to bring the frozen part of the body back to normal temperature gradually and to restore circualation.

Ada Lawyer Filed For Judge In 14th Judicial District

Attorney M. A. Brattland has filed his name to appear upon the ballot in the coming spring primaries for District Court Judge in the Fourteenth Judicial District. Judge Wm. Watts, the present incumbent whose term expires, has made it known that he will not run again on account of his failing health. Some months ago Judge Watts notified the attorneys of that district of his intention to resign, but on account of his improvement in health he will no doubt serve out his present term.

M. A. BRATTLAND

During the time when it appeared there would be an appointment to be made by the Governor, Attorney Brattland was endorsed by seven out of the eight Farmer-Labor County Committees then organized in the district, and the district being predominently progessive, he has now been urged to place his name before the electorate.

He is ideally fitted to serve the district on the District Court bench, having been engaged in active country practice over a period of time when there were a great many important cases being litigated in the district, and he has had a wealth of legal and practical experience.

Mr. Brattland is a graduate of the University of Minnesota and practiced law a short time in Minneapolis. Thereafter he moved to McIntosh before going to Norman County where he served as Judge of Probate for two terms and county attorney for twelve years.

Always a political progressive, Mr. Brattland campaigned extensively in the northwest in the famous national campaign of 1896 in behalf of the Peoples' party and Democratic Joint candidates.

Under the provisions of law, February 15 is the last day that motor vehicle owners may reregister their vehicles this year without penalty for delayed registration. The registrar has no authority to extend the time; therefore, since the legislature is not in session this year, there is no possibility of any such extension in 1934 as there was last year. Penalty for delayed registration will, therefore, begin February 16.

Seaway Pact Passage Due In A Few Weeks

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater association considers the seaway treaty now within less than 10 votes of ratification, it was learned this week.

This feeling is based on informall polls taken of the senate, said to have revealed 38 Democrats for ratification, 19 Republicans and one Farmer-Laborite.

Thirteen Democrats are definitely against the treaty, ten Republicans likewise oppose it, and the other votes are doubtful.

Ratification of the treaty would require 64 votes. Reservations with which the treaty is loaded from such senators as J. Ham Lewis, Democrat of Illinois, and Bennett Champ Clark, Democrat of Missouri, further complicate the picture, as acceptance by the senate as many of these might cause rejection of the treaty by Canada.

President Roosevelt continues bombardment of the senate with almost a "report a day" from agencies favoring the treaty.

Charles Craig, executive secretary of the Tidewater association, said that he expected the debate on the treaty to proceed almost without interuption now and predicts a vote in two or three weeks.

"Climb though the rocks be rugged"

Editor in Chief -- Evelyn Larson

We have begun to make plans for our Valentine party. It was decided to be a dress up party.

The first graders received new Reading books this week.

The third grade grade Arithmetic class are studying the multiplication tables. The 7th and 8th grade composition class, wrote composition entitled "Citizenship". This one was voted to be the best.

"CITIZENSHIP"

Citizenship should mean a great deal to everyone. If your community were not made up of good citizens, what would it be like?

Everyone should take interest and help his community by being a good citizen.

You all are citizen's of the United States of America, therefore, you should take interest in everything that happens through out the country. If you are a good citizen of your country, you will help to protect it and the constitution will help to protect you. By all means do not regard the flag as a piece of cloth that came from the garbage chute. Do you not know, that the American flag was carried high in the wars for freedom, as well as other wars? When Betsy Ross made the flag, perhaps she did not know what a great deed she was doing for our country. Show your respect to the flag by saluting it and take care of it in every way.

When an alien receives his citizenship papers, he must swear to support the constitution, and he must always try to be a good citizen which he always tries to do.

During the world war, the soldiers, who enlisted did a great deed for the country. They were good citizens, and did their duty as citizens when they went to war. They were taking a great risk, lying around the muddy trenches expecting death any minute. Many of them were taken and did not return home again.

I hope that you will all be good citizens, and try to help your community throuh organizations and many other ways.

Evelyn Larson.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of salvaging a long-sunken French corvette. The comte De Corlay and his son Robert claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A sailor Sebastien, also is seeking the treasure. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay and Tom agree to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered. Next morning Jessica dives and attaches a line to the Fourquet. Then Sebastien, with two companions, arrives. Learning the situation, Sebastien produces a revolver, apparently intent on killing both the girl and the doctor, but hesitates when he hears the sound of an approaching boat. Tom and Robert, hastening to the Fourquet, in a motor boat, suddenly discover their propeller declines to budge. Investigating, Tom finds it is enveloped in the folds of an old fishing net, and correctly ascribes the act to Sebastien. He disentangles the net, and they proceed.

Mike had heard the splintering of glass when steering, and looked in to see the Frenchman gathering up the fragments of a broken bottle. Mike had thought no more about it, the bottle having been empty. How long had he been here? Fifteen minutes, perhaps. Captain MacFarlane would rais-a-da-heck with him. Where ina da blazes was he to get the t'ing repaired?

Mike must have been considerably astonished at the zeal shown by Tom in aiding his extremity. Tom hastily explained it in some measure by stating that Doctor White was his dearest friend, and what was more, guardian of the girl he hoped to marry—which really should have been explanation enough for anybody. He rushed Mike and the helmet over to the garage. The proprietor, who lived over the garage, was not awake until about ten seconds after Tom got there. The two were boyhood friends, and Tom's fistful of bills talked even more urgently than did Tom, which is saying something. A fast car and a high-beaked driving fool were mobilized quickly.

"Beat it to Bath," panted Tom, "And get that thing fixed in a tearing hurry, or get one like it. The whole works, if you have to. Burn the wind, and burn money, whether you have to or not. It's a big newspaper story, and there's a reporter from a rival paper here, or on his way to beat me to it."

These maneuvers had consumed about an hour. Time enough for Sebastien to get around there in his boat, provided he had her ready, as Tom believed he had. The entire situation was clear enough to Robert and himself, except for its pivotal point. Had Doctor White known all along that it was the wreck of the Fourquet out there on the reef, and that it was high time he did something about it? Such a hypothesis was not at all in character with Doctor White, but it seemed to be the only one that promised any possible solution.

"This thing is getting pretty thick," Tom said to Robert. "We seem to be flocking in from all sides, like buzzards to a dead donkey. But the all-important business is to shut out Sebastien. He spotted this fellow's gear and fixed it for him, then beat it back to get his boat. And to think how near we came to burning up old Dave MacFarlane's packet, and thus scrambling the eggs even scrambleder."

Robert gave a cool nod, then asked, "Why the tearing hurry to get this diver's helmet for Doctor White, Tom?"

Tom glanced at his ally. "To beat Sebastien. Why?"

Robert raised his dark eyebrows. "What good is it going to do us to beat Sebastien if Doctor White sends down a diver to locate and claim the wreck?" he asked, pithily.

Tom's face hardened. "Because Sebastien is a thieving Canuck, and Doctor White a fine square man," he answered hotly.

"Quite so. He is also, as you just told this diver, your warm friend and the guardian of the girl you hope to marry. I beg to remind you that you have pledged your word of a Yankee to keep your faith with me, and I don't think that permits of your helping Doctor White!"

Tom stared at Robert with a good deal of confusion smothering his first anger. He was unable to find the right answer to this protest. Tom was quick-tempered about some things, but he was fair-minded, sometimes to the damage of his own rightful interest. So that now, while doubly stung, he was hobbled. The best he could manage was to blurt out, "Well, wouldn't you rather that Doctor White got first claim on the wreck than Sebastien?"

"No, I would not," Robert answered, and added very concisely, "I might be able to attack Sebastien's claim and to recover on it. But it would not be worth my while to attack any claim of Doctor White's."

Here was sound opinion directly stated, and Tom was bound to acknowledge the justice of it. The chances were that Doctor White had got to thinking about that prominent part of the ledge after seeing Robert and his father studying it, and had gone out later in his boat and thumped a lead on it, just as Robert had done. The doctor might even have driven a weighted horse mackerel harpoon down into it, or something of the sort. Such procedure, followed by a hurry call for a diver, did not match up at all with the liberal, easy-going methods of a man who had never been known to take a mean, though legal, advantage of anybody; and Tom could not see him doing such a thing, especially after extending his hospitality to these foreign treasure seekers whose moral claim, after all, had to be acknowledged.

"Perhaps you're right, Lieutenant," he muttered. "Anyhow what I've agreed to, stands. Just what do you want me to do?"

"No more than that," Robert answered. "Stick to your agreement with me. Nothing was said about any third party taking a hand in this game, but I think it was quite well understood that we were in it first and last for ourselves. As I see it, there's not such a tremendous difference between Sebastien eavesdropping through the speaking tube and Doctor White watching me take a bearing on the position of the wreck." His voice altered suddenly to its former comradely tone. "So you really can't blame me, old chap, at finding it a bit thick that you should suddenly let me down for Doctor White."

"Well, but I never meant it that way."

"Of course not. I thoroughly appreciate your point of view. You reasoned that since the game was blown all over the shop through my playing like a ghastly ass, the best move would be to throw in with the next best man—for both of us, of course."

Tom had felt this coming. Honest as he was to the very core and with that exaggerated faculty to see the other person's point of view, often to be found in strong, simple natures, he could not blame Robert. Worse than that, he could find no argument with which to meet his demand. It was, so far as Tom could discover, logical and consistent. The evidence all went to vindicate it. Robert had no reason to favor Doctor White, or to consider him other than as one more person who had spied out his secret and was in train to bilk him of its potential value. And here was the chance to derail that train.

What made it infinitely harder for Tom was his being obliged to admit that if any other person than Doctor White had been in the same position, there would not have been the slightest hesitation or opposition over doing as Robert suggested. Tom would have proposed it himself. So that he now found himself obliged to take his choice between betraying his ally or betraying his friend. The former course would mean to Robert an act of treachery for a self-interested motive.

Then, in the darkness of despair, Tom's honest soul was lightened by a little gleam that suggested how he might get out of the predicament with honor—and nothing more. But that much was worth a lot to Tom.

"Say, Bob, our agreement was that if we pulled this thing off we were to split three ways on the proceeds of it."

"Right. That's the way I understood it, Tom."

"Well, then, I will assign my share to Doctor White and guarantee that he will be satisfied with that, if we back his play from now on."

"But how can you guarantee that, Tom? How do you know that he will honor any such pledge on your part?"

Tom gave him a steady look. "How was I to know that your father would honor yours?"

Robert smiled. "There you've got me, Tom."

"You know your father," Tom said, "and I took your word for it. I know Doctor White and I guess it's up to you to take my word for it."

Robert looked at him steadily, and as he looked a glow of admiration kindled in his eyes. He thought that he had rightly read his man, but now he believed that he had underread him. The emotional part of his nature was stirred. He had guessed at the stake for which Tom had been playing, and he had felt while talking to Jessica that he easily might become keen to play for it himself.

"I'll take your word for anything, Tom," Robert said.

"Well, then let's get busy," Tom answered. "For all we know, Sebastien may be out there on the job right now."

CHAPTER X

It was by this time five o'clock, full day in that high latitude and the month of July. The sun was scorching the top of a fog that it might or might not be able to dissipate by noon. Some mackerel fishermen grouping about the fish house were inclined to think the fog was in to stay. With the Gulf Stream flowing northeast far off shore and the cold Labrador current pushing southwest along the coastline and the breezes fickle, anybody had a right to his guess. This sea fog that brings the blood to the girls' cheeks is not worth much to the toiler of the sea, unless perchance he be a contrabandist.

Winter Busy Time for Fruit Grower

Removing of Surplus Trees, Pruning and Grafting Most Important.

By W. H. Thies, Extension Pomologist, Massachusetts State College.—WNU Service.

There is no long vacation season for the apple grower. The winter season may not find the fruit grower so rushed as in the midst of spraying or harvesting the crop, but still there are things which must be done.

One of the most important jobs is removing surplus trees. These trees include neglected apple trees in fields or fence rows, trees which never receive any spraying or pruning, and as a result are an excellent breeding place for insects and diseases of all kinds. They constitute a menace to commercial orchards in the vicinity. In some orchards, filler trees were planted and the trees have now grown so large that the main crop trees are being crowded and shaded. These filler trees should be removed as soon as they are large enough to begin crowding.

Pruning is another dormant season job for the fruit grower. As much money is wasted by poor pruning as is gained by good pruning, but this only serves to emphasize the importance of pruning properly.

Another job for the dormant season is top-grafting trees of poor varieties which are more popular on the market. This is a much quicker way of changing varieties in the orchard than cutting down the old trees and planting new ones.

Some of the most valuable winter orchard work is of the easy-chair type. This work includes starting an orchard account, to reckon costs of production, as well as profit and loss; planning the year's program of pest control, sales, and storage; reading up on recent experimental results; and attending meetings of fruit growers.

Feed Crops Being Grown in Hurry by Tray Plan

The picturesque labor of hay-making may soon be seen only in rural landscapes in our picture galleries if tests being made at the National Dairy institute, near Reading, prove successful, says London Tit-Bits.

Two metal cabinets, each fitted with trays, have been installed at the institute's farm. These are the "trial grounds." A solution of mineral salts above each tray sprays a thickly-spread seedbed of maize or oats. Under the treatment growth which would normally take ten weeks takes ten days.

The shoots, some 12 or 14 inches tall, are then ready to feed dairy cows or fatten bullocks, and this process is repeated the year round. It is claimed that 36 crops can be raised in a year, and 40 of these cabinets in a barn will yield about 4,320 tons of fodder, enough to feed 1,200 head of cattle.

The crops, it is said, are free from contamination, and as the fresh green shoots have a high vitamin content cattle benefit considerably. It is proposed to set up a chain of depots in the principal agricultural areas of the country.

Rendering Lard

The leaf fat makes the best lard. Back fat and fat trimmings also make a good product. The intestinal fat makes inferior lard, and should never be mixed with the other, as it would give the better lard an offensive odor and flavor. It should be rendered separately and used for soap. Remove any lean meat from fat to prevent scorching. Cut the fat in pieces one inch square. Put in a well-cleaned kettle with a little water in the bottom to prevent the fat from burning before the grease comes out. Cook over a moderate fire, stirring frequently to prevent sticking to the kettle. When the cracklings are brown and light enough to float remove the kettle from the fire. Press out the cracklings and strain lard through a muslin cloth into clean cans or jars. Stir slowly as it cools, as this tends to whiten it, and makes the lard finer and more uniform in texture.—Rural New Yorker.

Planting the Hotbed

For best results when planting seed in a hotbed the seed should be sown in rows about four to six inches apart. In planting be sure that only four or five seeds are used to the inch, as closer planting will result in crowding. In growing plants in hotbeds especial care must be given to watering and temperature. Too much water is worse than too little, so in watering the plants apply just enough to thoroughly wet the soil. Temperature, however, is of prime importance and should be regulated so that the hardy plants, such as cabbage, lettuce, and onions have a day temperature of 60-65 and a night temperature of from 50 to 55. Warm season crops require temperatures of ten degrees higher.

Soft Water Cisterns

Concrete cisterns are generally considered most satisfactory receptacles in which to hold soft water. They can be built in cellars and joined to foundation walls when the latter are made of water-proof materials. If built under the kitchen or pantry, it will be found very convenient for drawing with a small pump. The water will be kept from freezing in winter and in a cool cellar will be kept from breeding maggots or midges that often appear in large tubs, barrels or cisterns.

SOCIAL GRACES MEAN MUCH AS BUSINESS ASSET

On the coat of arms of one of England's schools, founded in the late Fourteenth century by William of Wykeham, it is written that "Manners Makyth Man." The cultivation of courtesy and the outward evidences of good breeding, therefore, may be considered one of the earliest purposes of education. But a teacher of today has discovered by questioning 4,114 boys and girls in high schools throughout this country that courtesy in word and deed is sadly lacking among members of the younger generation, who know neither the need for good manners nor the proper way to practice them.

This is their own loss, though not altogether their own fault. "Good manners," says Dr. Ruth Strang, assistant professor of education at Teachers' college, Columbia university, "which appear somewhat superficial and trivial, may be an important factor in adolescent adjustment and an aid to good mental hygiene." The shyness of youth is very often due to ignorance of etiquette, and sometimes bad manners conceal a keen sense of embarrassment which could be cured by proper training in the social graces.

Stylists say that this is the time for a "return to elegance." But though it has been said that clothes make the man, and possibly the woman, there is more truth in the ancient adage which gives the credit to manners.

Doctor Strang's researches indicate a direct effect of home environment on the manners of boys and girls. The school cannot hope to offset this influence altogether, and it may not be its business to try to do so. But youngsters can be taught the value of good manners as an asset for success in business and civilized society, and will then find it easy and pleasant to learn the customs, conventions and courtesies of which good manners are made.

Lesson in Justice Holmes Finding New 'Firing Line'

"I always thought," said Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, when he was eighty years old, "that when I got to be four-score I could wrap up my life in a scroll, tie a pink ribbon around it, put it away in a drawer, and go around doing the things I wanted to do. But I learned that when you have taken one trench there is always a new firing line beyond."

That was when he was eighty—deciding that there was always a new firing line! So we might guess—if so many Washington correspondents had not said it of him—that at eighty and past eighty, this man was interesting, he was living to the fullest extent, and he was one of the few of whom people would hazard the opinion that he was happy. And when, near ninety-one, he finally retired from the Supreme court bench, what he did to remain happy was probably to live as nearly as possible the same busy kind of life he had always led.

No one pitied Justice Holmes for not being able to retire, and, at eighty, "do the things I wanted to do." The things we have always wanted to do are very likely, with most of us, to be food for just a summer, and to pall before a vacation time is over. What we all want to do is to live fully as long as we live, to be doers and givers as long as we live, to live with zest for ourselves and interest for others.

That was one advantage that men, in past generations, had over women. They stayed interesting longer, they stayed young longer, because they stayed longer, as a rule, in a vortex of activity. They were not, in middle life, like most of their wives, left high and dry with the privilege of deciding what it was they wanted to do. There were always too many things which they were called upon to do. And that is the great boon for women in this day and age—the opportunity for interests and activities which do not end when their children grow up, interests and even work outside the home which give them into the later years what the French call "raison d'etre"—a reason for being. Rather we should say of these activities that what they give us is a reason for being busy, for being necessary, for being important, for being interested in every day, and therefore for being interesting—and happy.

Not least among the good wishes I extend to my readers for the coming year is: May you continue to find "always a new firing line" ahead!

More Platinum Used

World consumption of platinum metals in 1933 totaled 175,000 ounces, compared with approximately 75,000 ounces in 1932, according to a report of Charles Engelhard. "Reflecting the accelerated activity of business generally," Mr. Engelhard says, "this concurrent movement of the metal reaffirms the importance of platinum to industry, and for that matter, through the production of nitrates from the air, to the farm."

Eat Less, and Avoid Fatness, Says Doctor

People get fat, says Popular Mechanics Magazine, because each day they eat just a little more than they require. This is the conclusion of Dr. Francis G. Benedict, director of the nutrition laboratory of the Carnegie institution of Washington, who has devoted years of investigation to the subject. It is that extra pat of butter or its equivalent, taken with each meal, that puts on the pounds.

One extra ounce of fat a day, or three pats of butter, means a gain in weight of a pound in about two weeks, or about 25 pounds a year. It is the excess—the fat above daily needs—that adds to weight.

There is no royal road to slimness, Doctor Benedict asserts, adding that the best way to lose fat is not to get fat. If you are fat, it is nearly hopeless to try to work it off. The one way to lose fat intelligently is to limit the intake and burn it up slowly. Fats are about twice as concentrated as starches and sugars, so it is helpful to avoid all visible fats in foods.

Why Hospitals Use a Liquid Laxative

Hospitals and doctors have always used liquid laxatives. And the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form. Do you know the reasons?

The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can be controlled. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will a mild liquid laxative irritate the kidneys.

The right liquid laxative brings a perfect movement, and there is no discomfort at the time, or after.

The wrong cathartic may keep you constipated as long as you keep on using it! And the habitual use of irritating salts, or of powerful drugs in the highly concentrated form of pills and tablets may prove injurious.

A week with a properly prepared liquid laxative like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will tell you a lot. A few weeks' time, and your bowels can be "as regular as clockwork." Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is an approved liquid laxative which all druggists keep ready for use. It makes an ideal family laxative; effective for all ages, and may be given the youngest child. Now! Ease Sore Throat Instantly!

1 Crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in half a glass of water.
2 GARGLE thoroughly—throw your head way back, allowing a little to trickle down your throat.
3 Repeat gargle and do not rinse mouth, allow gargle to remain on membranes of the throat for prolonged effect.

Remember: Only Medicine Helps Sore Throat

Modern medical science now throws an entirely new light on sore throat. A way that eases the pain, rawness and irritation in as little as two or three minutes!

It requires medicine—like BAYER ASPIRIN—to do these things! That is why throat specialists throughout America are prescribing this BAYER gargle in place of old-time ways.

Be careful, however, that you get real BAYER Aspirin for this purpose. For they dissolve completely enough to gargle without leaving irritating particles.

President Asks for Nationalization of Gold Supply—Not Yet Ready to Fix Exact Value of Gold—Cuban Presidency Goes to Carlos Hevia.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT sent to congress his long-awaited message on monetary matters, and it should be in a measure reassuring to business and finance. He asked that the gold supply of the country be nationalized and that his powers be redefined to enable periodic revaluation of the dollar within a range of 50 to 60 per cent of the present gold content. He already had the power to devalue the dollar down to 50 per cent, but he does not do so yet, saying that "because of world uncertainties, I do not believe it desirable in the public interest that an exact value be now fixed." He added that careful study had led him to the conclusion that any revaluation at more than 60 per cent would not be in the public interest.

President Roosevelt

The President asked full power to take over the last outstanding supplies of gold in the country, much of which belongs to the federal reserve banks. The legislation he requested, he explained, "places the right, title and ownership of our gold reserves in the government itself; it makes clear the government's ownership of any added dollar value of the country's stock of gold which would result from any decrease of the gold content of the dollar which may be made in the public interest."

The profit that may result from cutting the gold content, the President proposed should be used to set up a two-billion-dollar fund for purchases and sales of gold, foreign exchange and government securities.

No further recommendations concerning silver were made in the message, the President saying he believed "we should gain more knowledge of the results of the London agreement and of our other monetary measures."

In talking with the correspondents, Mr. Roosevelt explained once more that the objective of his monetary program is to bring the purchasing power of the dollar back to the level at which the average debts of the country were incurred, so that these debts may be paid off with a dollar equal in value to that at which the debt was incurred. He made it clear that his program does not call for a resort to greenback currency.

Immediately after the reading of the President's message, Senator Duncan U. Fletcher of Florida, chairman of the senate banking and currency committee, introduced the administration's bill to effect the monetary changes proposed. He called his committee together the next day to consider it, and Secretary Morgenthau was the first to be heard in argument for the legislation asked.

Only two Democratic senators came out in the open promptly in opposition to the President's program, Carter Glass of Virginia and Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma. Both declared that the appropriation of the reserve banks' gold was unlawful and immoral. Most of the Republicans were cautious in their expressions of opinion.

Secretary Morgenthau made a final attempt to get into the treasury all remaining private gold holdings. By his order all persons who did not turn in their gold by midnight January 17 are liable to have it confiscated and to being fined double the amount of their holdings.

RAMON GRAU SAN MARTIN finally yielded to the force of circumstances and resigned as president of Cuba. His decision to quit was made at a closed meeting of government leaders, who thereupon undertook to select a man to fill the office temporarily. Antonio Guiteras, secretary of the interior and of war, wanted the job, but he was shut out of the meeting. A newspaper quoted him as saying the navy would fight if an agreement was reached unsatisfactory to him and his followers. The leaders of the various cliques were debating whether to pick Carlos Mendieta, who was supported by Col. Fulgencio Batista, commander of the army, or Carlos Hevia, the young secretary of agriculture.

The choice finally fell on Hevia, whom Colonel Batista consented to tolerate, and the thirty-three-year-old statesman, after several hours of hesitation, announced: "I am the president." There was a lot of rioting in Havana and at the nearby Camp Columbia and at least three men were killed.

Just before he resigned, San Martin signed a decree by which the government took over full control of the $100,000,000 properties of the Cuban Electric company, which is owned by Americans. This was because the employees of the company had struck and all the power and gas for most of the island was cut off.

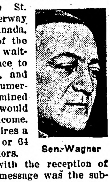
HENRY B. HUNT, a spokesman for Secretary Ickes, appeared at the hearing on the electric code and strongly denounced the private power industry and its ruling elements for "unsocial conduct" and "nefarious practices." Like the federal power commission, he declared codes for public utilities should not be considered. Hunt directed his attack especially at the Edison Electric institute, proponent of the power code, and said his charges were borne out by the records of the federal trade commission power investigation.

Both Hunt and Frank R. McNinch, chairman of the power commission, assailed many provisions of the code as either intentional attempts or unguarded opportunities for the institute to seize much of the regulatory power over the industry now held by the United States and the several states, and designed to weaken the government and municipally operated power properties.

Their chief contention, however, was that the industrial act authorized codes only for non-monopolistic industries; that public utilities were rightly monopolistic in character, and that, therefore, the only thing the administration should do was obtain an agreement to improve hours and wages of the power employees.

PRACTICALLY without opposition, a measure was put through the house, and senate extending the life of the Reconstruction Finance corporation for another year and providing it with $850,000,000 of new capital. There was little debate, and in the house only Louis T. McFadden of Pennsylvania voted against the bill.

PUTTING to the test his influence over the senate President Roosevelt in a special message to that body asked speedy consideration and ratification of the St. Lawrence waterway treaty with Canada. The opponents of the pact had been waiting for the chance to start the battle, and they were so numerous and so determined that no one would predict the outcome. Ratification requires a two-thirds vote, or 64 of the 96 senators.



Sen. Wagner

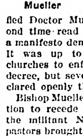
Coincidental with the reception of the President's message was the submission of a minority report by Senator Wagner of New York as a member of the foreign relations committee, in which Mr. Wagner argued vigorously against ratification of the treaty. He declared the cost of the waterway to the United States would be $573,136,000 instead of the $272,453,000 estimated by the proponents of the pact; and he asserted the United States would spend three times as much as Canada, though the Dominion would receive a "vast preponderance" of the benefits. The senator added:

"Most important of all, I am not in favor of a public works project designed to employ Canadian workmen with United States money. The treaty provides that although the United States is to supply the funds for most of the work in the International rapids section of the St. Lawrence river, the portion of this work on the Canadian side of the section is to be performed with Canadian workmen using Canadian materials.

The President's message to the senate gave his opinion that the treaty was fair, that the waterway project was economically sound. He declared that "local fears of economic harm to special localities or to special interests are grossly exaggerated." He attempted to dispose of opposition from Illinois and Mississippi valley senators by declaring that the treaty provision on the diversion at Chicago was adequate to guarantee a sufficient volume of water.

The opposition of Chicago and the Mississippi valley to the treaty was voiced especially by Senators James Hamilton Lewis of Illinois and Bennett Champ Clark of Missouri.

GERMANY'S great church quarrel goes on unabated and the Evangelical pastors are still determined that their religion shall not be nazified. Reichsbishop Ludwig Mueller, who is a confidant of Chancellor Hitler, issued a decree forbidding pastors to criticize the Nazi Protestant church administration from the pulpits under pain of dismissal from the church. But the rebellious ones, organized as the Pastors' Emergency league, defied Doctor Mueller and for the second time read to their congregations a manifesto demanding his resignation. It was up to the councils of the churches to enforce the reichsbishop's decree, but several of the councils declared openly they would not do so.



Dr. Ludwig Mueller

Bishop Mueller showed some inclination to recede from his position, but the militant Nazi German Christian pastors brought great pressure to bear, telling him they would support him only so long as he stuck by his decrees. The bishop also seeks to annul all church laws passed in 1933 so he can proclaim new ones.

HOW TO ADJUST NEW LEISURE?

Matter Has Reached Status of a Problem.

The same question—what people are to do with all the leisure created by the new provisions for shorter working hours—which has struck Grover Whalen, has occurred to other minds. John W. Davis uttered it not long ago, for one. Mr. Whalen uses his local authority under the federal administration to name a committee of qualified men to find a wise answer to the question, and he includes Mr. Davis among the number.

The subject is not a new one. It came up for general discussion in the middle twenties, long before the big boom or the panic, at the time when increased mechanical equipment for production, as a consequence of the war, was cutting down working hours. The new committee will find books, articles and institutional studies that appeared then and are fairly applicable.

There was a gigantic surplus of leisure during the period of depression; one heard little about it, since it was leisure minus means. Now the plans for the New Deal propose cutting down working hours without reducing pay. They would thus resume the process that was going on before the slump and that had already made great headway.

A great number of adults in this area are now to have gainful work, restricted to 40 hours a week. Allowing them 112 waking hours a week, we may suppose that they spend 14 of these at meals, another 14 in necessary travel and seven in care of the person. At this fairly leisurely pace all around they will still have 37 hours a week at their own disposal, or about one-third of their waking time. This free time is to be longer by one-fifth for a multitude of people. For others in some exceptional lines it is to be doubled or more.

Some people, of course, have the knack of amusing themselves by social intercourse, games, study, physical or other exercise and systematic reading; such people present no problem, but they are probably the exception. Great numbers, at all events, want not to entertain themselves but to be entertained; the New Deal might easily fill the movies with such individuals as never before. And longer programs for places that provide entertainment at low cost might become the order of the day.

But there are yet another group. Many like to work for themselves—women, to make their own garments; men, to "work around the place." The trouble with such an employment of leisure, from the point of view of general employment, is that it diminishes the amount of work that some one would otherwise be hired to do.

Should authority discourage the once-virtuous taste for doing one's own small jobs? No move of a restrictive sort seems likely at this time, nor as long as the control of leisure remains in its infancy.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Minnesota counties will save more than one million dollars a year from now on by being relieved of maintenance and improvement costs on the 4,500 miles of county roads taken into the state trunk system this month. This is the estimate of the state highway department.

The average county expenditure on the heavily travelled roads which were generally added to the state system has been about $200 a year for maintenance alone, according to highway department engineers, although this figure varies considerably in different localities.

As all these roads also require frequent outlays for improvements and betterments in addition to maintenance, the savings to county taxpayers should run far higher than a million dollars a year over a period of several years.

The state highway department must maintain and improve the new routes from its regular revenues. This year it has a trunk system 11,300 miles in length to care for, compared with only 6,800 miles previously. The highway department reduced its expenditures in 1933 by more than 50 per cent, compared with 1932.

Abraham Lincoln

His 125th birthday next Monday.

Minnesota was the first state in the Union to set aside Lincoln's birthday as a legal holiday, according to contemporary newspaper accounts in the collections of the Minnesota Historical society. The legislative act which designated February 12 as a statewide holiday was signed by Governor Clough on Feb. 12, 1895, and became effetive in 1896

Celebrations in honor of Lincoln were held all over the state on his birthday in 1896. In St. Paul the Minnesota commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion sponsored a reception and banquet at the Ryan hotel. Captain Henry A. Castle presided over the gathering, which was attended by four hundred people. Robert T. Lincoln, a son of the martyred president, was invited to attend, but was unable to do so, and a letter from him expressing his regrets was read. Other celebrations in the city were arranged by the Lincoln Republican club and by the Young Men's Central Republican club.

In Minneapolis a meeting of the political clubs of the University of Minnesota, at which Dr. William W. Folwell presided, was attended by five hundred students, and Governor Clough addressed eight hundred people at a banquet sponsored by the Lafyyette Papineau club.

Schools and state, municipal, and county offices all over Minnesota were closed for the day, and churches and lodges everywhere conducted memorial programs. Special exercises were held in the state prison at Stillwater, and each inmate was "permitted to write an extra letter" in honor of the day.

Free License Is Mistake

P. A. Beckjord, president of the Midway Club of St. Paul, has refused to accept free drivers license for his wife and five children on the grounds that "It is ridiculous to expect the state to issue seven licenses for 25 cents."

He so notified the drivers license division of the highway department.

If our legislators really believe that the licensing of drivers is for the purpose of making our highways safer," said Mr. Beckjord, "the law must be changed so that sufficient revenue is available to provide adequat enforcement of the measure. Every driver should pay for his own individual license and there should be provision for renewal of licenses."

Lutheran Ladies Aid Circle Organizing Now Completed

Six Circles have now been organized in the Nazareth Lutheran Ladies Aid. The purpose of these Circles is to give the ladies living far from church an equal chance with those who live near to "do their bit" for the Aid, and to make the meetings more sociable.

The Circles consist of about 12 women in each circle. The Circle meets once a month and all the Circles meet in one group at the church parlors once a month. The Ladies Aid at the church is served by six ladies or half a Circle, thereby makeng it a great deal easier to serve the Aid than when two ladies served

Plans have been made in most circles for making fancy work or quilts, to be sold at an auction sale later.

This arrangement of the Ladies Aid was voted to be tried for one year.

Circle No. 1 takes in the ladies northwest of town, Circle No. 2 takes in those four miles east of town, Circle No. 3 takes in those in East Valley, Circle No. 4 takes in those southeast of town, and Circles No. 5 and 6 takes in all those in the village. It is also probable that Circle No.7, taking in some ladies southwest of town will be organized later.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN © The Safety Man

The other day while giving a safety talk to a group of school children, I mentioned the fact that accidents do not happen, but that they are caused.

When we hear of an accident, and especially a serious one, people immediately ask, "How did it happen?"

Upon careful investigation and analysis you will always find that the accident did not happen, that someone or something caused it. When a man drives his automobile out of his garage and knows that the brakes are not in first class condition and will not stop in an emergency, and he later on has an accident, is the car or are the brakes to blame? Senseless machines never caused an accident and an automobile has never been known to leave the curb of its own accord. In this case the man knowing that the brakes were not in first class condition caused the accident, and he, and he alone, is responsible and to blame for it.

Just look back over some of the accidents you have seen or have been in and try to analyze them.

Accidents do not happen they are caused.

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young newspaper reporter in love with Jessica Poole, has a hope of salvaging a long-sunken French corvette. The comte De Corlay and his son Robert claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A sailor Sebastien, also is seeking the treasure. Jessica informs Doctor White, her guardian, that she has located the Fourquet, and by making a line fast to the hulk can establish a legal claim to salvage. Robert De Corlay and Tom agree to work together and divide what treasure may be recovered. Next morning Jessica dives and attaches a line to the Fourquet. Then Sebastien, with two companions, arrives. Learning the situation, Sebastien produces a revolver, apparently intent on killing both the girl and the doctor, but hesitates when he hears the sound of an approaching boat. Tom and Robert, hastening to the Fourquet, in a motor boat, suddenly discover their propeller declines to budge. Investigating, Tom finds it is enveloped in the folds of an old fishing net, and correctly ascribes the act to Sebastien. He disentangles the net, and they proceed.

Tom feared that it might be worth a lot to Sebastien, who would have had ample time by now to get round to his fishing ground.

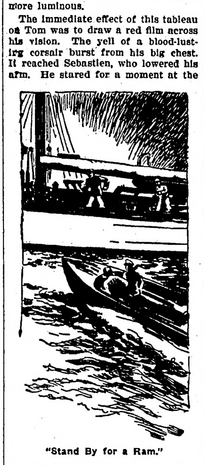
"You and I may not have anything on the skunk," he said to Robert, "but Dave MacFarlane has, and we can work that somehow. Let's run over and see if he is there, and if he's not we'll break out the doctor and get his view on where we all stand."

Robert wearily agreed. He felt that since the running of the show had been taken out of his hands, the best he could do was to trail along, thankful that it was at least in honest ones. Tom started the engine, and the tide being far out, gave the rocks jutting off Whale island a wide berth and approached the Corvette ledge on its outer end.

Just here the fog seemed to have thinned a little, or perhaps the growing strength of solar rays may have rendered it pellucid. As Tom bore down on the debated ground he shot suddenly into a sort of mist-encircled amphitheater where an astounding spectacle was in course of being rendered. So abruptly did this appear that it seemed to Tom as if he had pushed aside a heavy but diaphanous curtain hung at the entrance to the arena and found himself an unsuspecting but leading figure of the violent event, like a Spanish fighting bull loosed from its shrouded sequestration to burst into the battle zone of blood and sand.

Two animated objects were presented simultaneously. Just ahead lay Sebastien's heavy cruiser, with Sebastien by the mizzen shrouds and in the act of aiming a lethal weapon. And here on Tom's port bow was the moving target, a rowboat vigorously propelled by an oarsman that Tom recognized instantly as Doctor White.

The little shallop was badly trimmed for a race with bullets, down in the bow with a weight that represented an abstract value greater to Tom than that of his immortal soul, and a concrete worth in pounds avoirdupois or Troy more than its equivalent in radium, a substance that to him was no more luminous.



"Stand By for a Ram."

The immediate effect of this tableau on Tom was to draw a red film across his vision. The yell of a blood-lusting corsair burst from his big chest. It reached Sebastien, who lowered his arm. He stared for a moment at the boat foaming down on him, then, mindful of his need to avoid every appearance of evil, he shambled to the other side of the deck and dropped his weapon overboard. Perhaps it was his intention to deny that there had been any pistol, that his gesture had been a harmless one, wrongly interpreted as menacing, or purposely so for the dishonest motive of putting him in the wrong.

If so, it failed to serve him any useful purpose. Tom, mad as the aforementioned bull and charging as impetuously, neither slowed nor swerved his boat. The yawl-rigged cruiser was lying broadside on to his fore-and-aft dimension. Before any of the three aboard the anchored vessel could guess Tom's intention, a nemesis had hurtled from the void. The heavy launch, nearly straight of bow and built of solid oak, like many of the boats constructed for fishing or party jaunting in those rough, rock-strewn waters, crashed head on into the cruiser precisely on her most non-resisting point, which is plumb amidships, and at the most dangerous angle to the stricken craft, that of ninety degrees.

No small craft could receive such a body blow and still swim, unless she were built for Arctic exploration and the pressure of ice. The launch went into the punky tub like a woodsman's ax into a rotten log. Some few yards before the crash, Tom had called to Robert, "Stand by for a ram," and Robert had obeyed this order instantly by dropping to a sitting posture with his feet braced against the motor box.

Notwithstanding the disparity of weight between a thirty-foot open launch and a fifteen-ton fishing cruiser, the latter was considerably listed. Tom had rammed her nicely as she rolled away from him on the long low swell, and as she rolled back again she bore the launch's bow down almost awash, so that the propeller churned half in air, like an eggbeater. Tom reversed, and as the cruiser rolled sluggishly away again the launch backed clear.

After the first wild diapason of yells, Sebastien and his men were mute. Had the collision been an accident, the air would have remained filled with their vociferous abuse. But they knew that it was no accident. Also, it was necessary to consider their plans for the immediate future. The vessel was doomed, the brine pouring into her through a gap in which a fat pig could have scratched both sides.

Sebastien seemed to take it with the Indian stoicism that was a part of him. He hauled his dory alongside and started to throw the diving gear down into her, the two men rapidly salving other objects. Lower and lower settled the doomed ship, drawn down with increasing speed as the gap in her sank deeper and drank more thirstily. The sodden wood in her could not float the sailing ballast. With her decks almost awash Sebastien and his men got aboard the dory and cast off. He did not so much as glance at Tom and Robert.

Tom's hasty survey showed him that the launch had not suffered greatly. A boat strongly built can withstand a tremendous impact head on if the object struck gives a little, and the frame and planking of the old cruiser had given a good deal. The launch's bow was badly gouged and splintered, but she still was tight, and the solid lagscrews that held the motor to the oaken bed plates had been equal to the strain, of course, such eventuality being duly considered by the builders.

Then, with a lack of demonstration that had something pitiful about it, the cruiser went down to its long rest. She did this much as an old horse lies down, a lurch forward, another aft, then a grunt and general settlement. A great many hissing bubbles rose, and there formed over the spot a great bland area of peacock hues, oil enough to credit them with a sub, as Robert observed to Tom.

It seemed to Tom that Sebastien might have saved his craft if he had wished; keelhauled her and rigged a collision mat. But the man seemed indifferent, apathetic, as if he had been hit by a tidal wave or meteorite instead of a pair of business rivals in an open launch. The truth of the matter is that Sebastien was badly scared. He knew what these taciturn Yanks could be like, once they got started, and Tom impressed him as being well on his way. Sebastien actually expected to be sent down after his boat.

This certainly would have happened if he had fired on Doctor White and Jessica. In such event it is certain that Tom would have slain him. Even as it was he glared across the water at Sebastien as if mindful to finish his job.

Tom had good reason to feel that way about it. Not only was he convinced that the man had intended to murder Jessica and Doctor White, but the entire situation was infuriating. Here was Tom out of the running, so far as the winning of any sweepstake was concerned, still smarting from the sharp lesson in good faith read him by Robert, humiliated at the way in which the man of Miquelon had befooled him, even to the extent of a compulsory nocturnal bath.

The red mist had not yet cleared from Tom's vision, any more than it might from that of the fighting bull which having charged and gored the wretched crowbait bestridden by a picador, casts about with lurid eyes for a more interesting victim.

Here was no time for abuse. It needed but a whisper, Sebastien thought, to start Tom afresh on his devastating career. He could see that Tom was holding himself in leash, asking to be asked, when he would foam down again to smash him and his mates, rip them up, churn them into fish slum, egg-beat them up with his screw and generally shatter and stir them into fine particles suspended in brine.

He might have carried out this program without waiting to be invited, had not Doctor White called sharply. "Tom."

"Yes, sir," Tom answered, in a dull voice, his eyes still fastened on the dory.

Fifty Famous Frontiersmen

By

ELMO SCOTT WATSON

A Brave Man's Bluff

THE early fur traders were almost without exception a class of brave men, equaled in their daring only by their resourcefulness. Such a man certainly was Louis Chappieu, a French-Canadian voyager who shortly after the American Revolution had risen to the responsible position of agent for the British-American Fur company in charge of a trading post on the Menominee river where now stands the city of Marinette, Wis.

So long as he was dealing with the Menominee Indians who came to the mouth of the river by the hundreds at certain seasons every year to trade their mink, beaver, otter, bear and martin pelts for the white man's gewgaws, Chappieu had little to worry about, for they were unfailingly friendly.

But there came a day when a party of Chippewas who ranged between the Menominee river and Lake Superior, arrived at the fort, and this day Chappieu happened to be alone. Before he was aware of their identity the Chippewas were inside the stockade and had filed into the warehouse where he was busily engaged at the time. From the black looks which they gave him, he knew the Chippewas were in an ugly mood.

Soon the Indians became abusive and crowded around him with cocked rifles and tomahawks and knives drawn ready for use. The trader realized that they were planning to kill him and loot the post, so he tried to placate them as best he could. But the more he talked, the more abusive they became and he knew that the first move he made as though to resist them would be a signal for them to attack.

Hopelessly outnumbered and with no help near, Chappieu's situation seemed desperate. But he was of the breed of men who do not despair easily. Suddenly his eye, roaming about the room, lighted on an open barrel of gunpowder in the center of the room. Quick as a flash he had drawn a pistol, but instead of firing at one of the Indians he stepped over and pointed the pistol down into the barrel of powder. Then he faced the Chippewas and told them that he would give them just two minutes to get outside the stockade. If they did not, he would fire and they would all die together when he pulled the trigger of the pistol.

For a moment the Indians hesitated. Then to their ears came the ominous click of the pistol being cocked. One look at Chappieu's determined face told them what to expect. They departed—hastily. The trader's bluff had worked!

Old Bill Williams, Ex-Preacher and Lone Trapper

A TOWN in Arizona bears his name and thousands of tourists know it as the place where they leave the main line of the railroad for the branch line which goes up to the Grand Canyon. Near by is Bill Williams mountain, a 9,000 foot peak. It also perpetuates the fame of one of the most picturesque figures in Old West history.

"Old Bill" Williams was an eccentric character who is said to have been a circuit-riding preacher "back in the states" before he took to the plains and mountains of the West as a lone trapper. This is the pen picture of him that one historian has left us: "A tall, stooped man of Missouri fever-and-ague type; his thin, leathery face; his nut-cracker jaws; his punch chin and nose; his small, sharp, twinkling eyes; his querulous voice; slovenly habits; elk-hide suit, black with camp-fire smoke and slick with grease; his piebald, humpnosed Indian pony; were familiar to trappers, traders and Indians from the Three Forks to the Gila and from the states to California."

Not an impressive figure, to be sure, but there wasn't a frontiersman of his period more cunning in outwitting and eluding hostile Indians or more redoubtable in fighting them when cornered, nor a scout and guide more familiar with remote parts of the Rocky mountain region than he. For the latter reason it seems all the more unbelievable that he should have made such a failure as guide for Fremont's expedition around the head of the San Luis valley of Colorado in 1848, a failure which almost resulted fatally for the whole party.

The only possible explanation for "Old Bill's apparent unfamiliarity with one of his old stamping grounds is that he was old, infirm and half-blind from his many hardships of nearly 40 years on blazing deserts and in snow-filled mountains. After the rescue of the party, the old scout, feeling keenly the disgrace of his failure, fled once more to the solitudes of the mountains.

And soon afterwards the Indians "got" him—not in honest, open warfare but by treachery. In the spring of 1849 his body was found sitting against a tree in a secret recess of his favorite haunt, the Middle Park country of Colorado. There was a wound in his breast from a bullet fired by Indians he had considered his friends, the Utes. Their excuse was that he had betrayed their camp to hostile Arapahoes and the council decreed that he must die. They had exchanged rifles with him and as he sat in camp, unconscious of danger, one of the Utes had shot him.

WIFE'S PART IN MATE'S SUCCESS

World's Failures, as Seen by Psychologist.

While every normal man and woman strives to learn the secrets of success in life, how many pause to consider the causes of failure? Dr. Bernard Hollander, the psychologist, says the London Daily Mail, analyzed the reasons for failure while speaking at the London meeting of the South Place Ethical society. They ranged from sheer laziness and overweening ambition to the handicap of a bad marriage—the wife who is a millstone round her husband's neck.

"A man fails," said Doctor Hollander, "if his ideas are larger than his purse; if he trusts unworthy people; if he puts pleasure before duty and has too many or too expensive amusements; if he does not do today what he can possibly put off until tomorrow; and if he risks all his eggs in one basket when he is not in a position to watch or control it.

"Some men fail because they are given to dawdling, indecision, worrying or fretting, or have oversanguine expectations.

"A man is bound to fail if he has no sense of humor, lacks cordiality, does not know how to approach men, cannot take a rebuff good-naturedly, does not carry confidence or conviction, and when he is too long-winded in his conversation so that people tire before he gets to the point."

A good many failures in life, said Doctor Hollander, were due to overactive impulse, but the man whose animal nature was weak had no right to pose as virtuous, because temptation did not exist for him.

Success or failure in life depended also to a great extent upon the kind of partner in marriage.

"There is the nagging wife, the clinging wife, the domineering wife and the dull-witted wife who is something of a millstone round her husband's neck," he said.

"There is bound to be failure when an aggressive, masculine woman marries an effeminate youth; when an independent and courageous man marries a helpless, stupid woman; and an athletic, vigorous woman marries a dried-up bookworm.

"I have known girls to marry a man for such trivial reasons as that 'he dances divinely.'

"Neither society, the state, nor humanity can continue to exist without the old-fashioned wedded couple bound together by a bond of love and affection."

Human "Repair Shops"

The modern hospital is a human repair shop; it is not a mere lodging for sick people. The modern hospital is a laboratory for the doctor, for here he has the use of facilities and equipment which he could never afford to own. Dr. J. H. J. Upham refers in an article in a recent issue of Hygeia, the health magazine, chiefly to these facilities for recognizing disease rather than to the well equipped operating rooms, the comfortable bedrooms and wards, and other special features of the modern hospital because he wishes to emphasize the fact that the first aim of the modern physician should be to ascertain what exactly is the matter with his patient, how much the organs are damaged and how much he can depend on the natural vital forces remaining.

BATTLE ON BUGS CALLS OUT MAN'S SUPREME EFFORT

A war that never ceases is mankind's battle to maintain supremacy over destructive and injurious insect pests, in which science is pitted against unbelievable numbers and species of bugs that would destroy civilization if not checked.

While chemicals, poisons, insecticides and fire have all played an important part in this fight, the principal battles have been won through the employment of bug-eating bugs.

Two outstanding examples of parasitic control through the use of other parasites are included in a report recently issued by the federal bureau of entomology. One concerns the European corn borer and the other the gypsy moth, two of the most destructive pests.

Twenty species of corn borer parasites have been imported into this country, and 12 have done remarkable work in checking the ravages of this European pest. These parasites attack the corn borer in three ways. Some devour the eggs, others eat the caterpillar and still others destroy the borer in the intermediate stage. In no instance have these bugs been found preying on anything else except corn borers or their eggs or larvae.

About 50 species of insects were imported before one was found to help in the control of the gypsy moth. This is a tiny wasp, Anastatus disparis, which feeds entirely on the eggs of the gypsy moth. It hails from Japan and Russia and 60,000,000 were turned loose in the eastern states where this pest was ravaging forest and shade trees. Since their introduction a marked decrease has been found in the number of trees attacked by them.—Detroit News.

Determination of Sex

About thirty years ago it was discovered that sex is determined by the male cells and this because the cells are of two different sizes. One size gives rise to female and the other to male offspring. New political and social possibilities were envisioned. Biologists began to discuss ways of separating the two sorts and thus settling beforehand whether children should be boys or girls.

Soviet science, which is particularly active and daring in biological experimentation, has announced that the two kinds of male cells have at last been separated. In animals at least, it is now possible to determine exactly what the sex of progeny will be. So said Prof. Julian Huxley recently in an address that he delivered in London. But, cautious biologist that he is, he wants confirmation before he believes it.—New York Times.

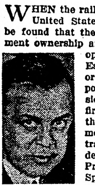
Eastman Foresees Government Ownership and Operation of Railways—Progress of President's Money Bill—American Recognition for Mendieta.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

WHEN the railroad problem of the United States is solved, it will be found that the solution is government ownership and operation, in the opinion of Joseph B. Eastman, federal coordinator of transportation. The conclusion is set forth in his first report, made to the Interstate Commerce commission and transmitted to President Roosevelt, Vice President Garner and Speaker Rainey. Mr. Eastman says the solution he foresees would not be inconsistent with our theory of government.



J. B. Eastman

Explaining that when governments acquire private property they normally pay more than it is worth, Mr. Eastman reaches the conclusion that the remedy should not be applied to railroads now because the country is not "financially in a condition to stand the strain of an acquisition of these great properties."

The co-ordinator, having set up what he wishes to be the objective of future national railroad policy, then proceeds to make recommendations within the limits of existing laws. He is decidedly skeptical of the Prince plan for consolidation of the roads, for his assistant, William B. Poland, has made studies that show the economies under this scheme would be less than one-third of the original estimates.

Most significant of the recommendations on consolidations is that proposals for compulsory consolidations should be given a trial, provided that the commission and the co-ordinator find the proposed mergers to be in the public interest. Mr. Eastman throws the weight of his approval behind a method of compulsory consolidation through exchange of securities without the use of cash. Execution of such a method, which the co-ordinator's legal assistant, Leslie Craven, believes can be accomplished, would accelerate the merging of eastern railroads into the four systems previously agreed upon.

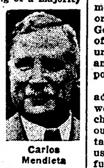
Mr. Eastman says that reorganization of railroads now bankrupt "should be effected as speedily as practicable, and in a manner which will result in a very material reduction in fixed charges." He calls attention to the fact that some of the most successful reorganizations in railroad history took place in the midst of financial depressions. Wall Street theory has been that reorganizations should be postponed as long as possible.

Many of the railroads' vital problems can be dealt with adequately by the carriers themselves, but "there is as yet insufficient organization and leadership in the industry for effective co-operation in such undertakings." It is quite possible, Mr. Eastman believes, that a study of these problems "will pave the way to a much larger use of motor vehicles as an adjunct to railroad service, and to a revamping and simplification of the freight-rate structure."

In advancing government ownership as the specific remedy for the industry, the co-ordinator notes the adverse effects of the competition of the railroads with each other, and of their inability to co-operate effectively in matters of common concern. This is illustrated in the difficulty with which standards of equipment and of supplies have been adopted. Difficulties in action toward the readjustment of rates also is cited, especially as related to meeting the threat from other mediums of transportation.

"The competition of these new agencies also makes the preservation of intense competition between railroads a much less important thing from the public point of view than it once was."

CARLOS MENDIETA is quite satisfactory to the United States as president of Cuba in view of the fact that he has the backing of a majority of the Cuban people and apparently is capable of restoring order in the island. So President Roosevelt informed the diplomatic envoys of the other Latin-American countries whom he had summoned to the White House. The President virtually invited the other nations to take the same course but made it clear that his mind was made up anyway. Secretary Hull after leaving the White House, said Colombia and Mexico already had recognized the Mendieta regime and Chile was about ready to do so. When Mr. Hull was on way home from South America he was met at Key West by Jefferson Caffery, the President's personal representative in Cuba, and fully informed on conditions and prospects in the island. Mr. Caffery is scheduled to be made ambassador to Cuba.



Carlos Mendieta

President Roosevelt plans to do several favors to Cuba that should make Mendieta solid with his people. The warships in Cuban waters will be withdrawn. The Platt amendment to the Cuban constitution, permitting the United States to intervene in Cuban affairs to maintain law and order will be junked. And congress will be asked to give Cuba a big preferential reduction in the American sugar tariff. Sugar raising is the island's chief industry and for five years it has been in a severe slump, and the resulting depression has caused much of the political disturbance.

Havana was jubilant over the news of President Roosevelt's action.

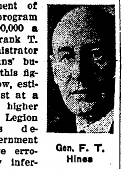
"Recognition is the greatest gift the United States can grant Cuba," commented President Carlos Mendieta. "It means that political stabilization in the island will be furthered and that a real start can be made with the co-operation of the United States toward economic rehabilitation.

"President Roosevelt may rest assured that I have personally assumed responsibility for foreign life and property, especially America's $2,000,000,000 investments here."

SECRETARY HULL, on his arrival in Washington, made a personal report to the President on the Pan-American conference in Montevideo; and in a statement to the press he said: "Confidence born of the feeling that the United States, instead of being an arrogant or indifferent big brother, is sincerely eager for the role of equal partnership with the other Americas has resulted in a surge of good will toward the United States."

The press in the leading South American cities is unanimous in the opinion that Mr. Hull has brought about a great betterment in the relations between Latin America and the United States and that there will be a decided increase of inter-American trade.

PLANS of the American Legion to ask congress for more liberal treatment of veterans have stirred up a row in Washington. The Legion is urging enactment of a four-point program to cost $80,000,000 a year. Gen. Frank T. Hines, administrator of the veterans' bureau, thought this figure was too low, estimating the cost at a considerably higher total. The Legion representatives declared the government estimates were erroneous and by inference accused General Hines of ulterior motives and lack of integrity. In a letter to Edward A. Hayes, commander of the Legion, Hines denounced the criticism of his estimates as wholly uncalled for and said the Legion's own rehabilitation committee had admitted they were more nearly correct than its own estimates.



Gen. F. T. Hines

Meanwhile the President had announced new modifications of his executive regulations concerning payments to disabled war veterans, the changes adding more than $21,000,000 annually. There were intimations at the White House that Mr. Roosevelt would seek to persuade the Democrats in congress not to go beyond this liberalization.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S money bill went through the house with a rush, the vote being 360 to 40. Sixty-eight Republicans joined the obedient Democrats in supporting the measure. James R. Claiborne of Missouri and George B. Terrell of Texas were the only Democrats recorded in the negative.

The senate received the bill and referred it to the banking and currency committee, which held a hearing that was lively while it lasted. Prof. George Warren, author of the dollar depreciation and gold purchase program, explained to the committee the theory of commodity price regulation by manipulation of the currency. Then, taking up consideration of the measure, the committee heard the vigorous objections of Senators Glass, Gore and McAdoo to several features of the bill, notably the proposed seizure of the federal reserve bank gold, and the granting of unlimited financial power to the secretary of the treasury.

It was confidently predicted by the administration leaders that the bill would be put through the senate unchanged, but stubborn fights over various proposed amendments were certain. The vote on a plan to limit the use of the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund was expected to be close. Advocates of the remonetization of silver, who are fairly numerous in the senate, prepared a compromise silver plan to be offered as an amendment to the devaluation measure.

THAT recovery outlays can be ended by June 30, 1935, is the belief of the President, and he gave expression to this when he announced his approval of the bill extending the life of the Reconstruction Finance corporation for another year. He enjoined Jesse Jones, chairman of the R. F. C., not to withdraw more than $500,000,000 from the treasury in the next fiscal year, except with prior Presidential approval.

For Achievement of Desires

Wishing, Alone, Can Never Bring Fulfillment of Hopes; Price of Thing Wanted Must Be Paid in the Overcoming of Difficulties.

The year is still young, too young for those who made New Year's resolutions to have become discouraged with their forgetfulness of them, and still young enough for those who want to make the year show progress in any definite lines, to still make plans for their fulfillment.

It is said that if you want a thing enough you will have it. Now is the time to remember the saying and apply it to the coming months. It is something that cannot end with the expressing of the desire, although to formulate the wish is important. It crystalizes the idea in your own mind. It helps to weed out the nonessentials in the wish, and clears the vision to see not only some openings whereby the desire can make progress, but also whether we actually want what we want enough to pay the price for it.

It is a mistake to think that what we want will fall to our lot without our doing anything about it. A wish which is completed with expressing it has no deep roots in our minds. It is just a casual voicing of a superficial desire. This is the most common sort of wish. It is heard every day as:

"I wish I could paint."

"I wish I could sing."

"I wish I could write."

"I wish I were on the stage. I know I could act."

And so a whole category of wishes could be given, with the knowledge that "in every Middlesex village and farm" many persons are making such wishes. Also there could well be the realization that most of the wishes would prove futile, although they could come true.

The reason for this is that so few persons want a thing enough to pay the price to get it. This price to which I refer has nothing to do with money. It is the toll of time and of work, of keeping one's self physically fit through exercise, through giving up social life except what could be sandwiched in between hours required for the work, and keeping the focus always on the wanted thing.

The old adage "There's no royal road to success" gives the pronouncement. Those who want a thing enough to have it will be willing to take the long road, and what is more they will find satisfaction and a certain pleasure in their progress on it. They will surmount difficulties. Eventually they will be envied by others who wanted to do similar things. Success can be attained in the things one wants but the person must not get easily discouraged, not be turned away from her purpose.

Carrier Pigeons Fail

The use of carrier pigeons has not been attended with any great degree of success by the members of the Royal Canadian Air force in forestry patrol. Birds were carried on airplanes with the hope that they would prove valuable in case of emergency. Several birds were released 500 miles from home, but a small number reached their objective point. They had encountered an electrical storm and were lost in the struggle. Those that did get through were very late. In another test one bird reached the home cote, but it had lost its message.

"Cherry Ripe, Ripe, Ripe!"

"CHERRY ripe, ripe, ripe,
I cry,
Full and fair ones,
Come and buy!"

The cherry is a festive fruit and always suggests something pleasant and cheerful, whether it is a luscious ox-heart or the bright red variety that makes such "melt-in-the-mouth" pies and tarts, or the demure looking white kinds, so much used for dessert.

The old song which we quote above was probably written at the height of the cherry season, which is brief, at best, or was—back in the seventeenth century. Fortunately for us moderns we are not limited to any special season for cherries, or most other fruits, because the canners capture them for us when they are at their very best and hold them in that delicious state, so that you can pick your "cherry ripe" right off the grocer's shelf whenever you are so inclined.

Deep Dish Cherry Tarts: One No. 2 can red pitted cherries, one-half cup sugar, four tablespoons flour, one tablespoon butter, two-thirds cup cherry syrup. Drain cherries and divide among eight individual tart tins, or custard cups or ramekins. Mix sugar and flour and sprinkle over cherries. Put bits of butter on top. Pour over cherry syrup. Cut out rounds of pie pastry. Cut slit in tops and press over tops of tins or custard cups. Bake about thirty minutes, having oven hot—425 degrees—at first, then reduced to 350 degrees.*

Dog Wants to Be Boss

The sense of proprietorship is more strongly developed in the dog than in any other animal, an instinct reminiscent of the wolf's fierce resentment at interference with its prey. Your pet will thus be a much more efficient watch dog to leave in your car if you will give him an old coat or some other object to guard as his own when you leave him.

Likes Lima Beans.

IMA DODO says she likes lima beans because their first name is nearly the same as hers. That's a peculiar reason for liking them, and she would find a better one if she tried the following green vegetable combination:

Lima Beans and Cabbage en Casserole: Boil in salted water two cups of shredded cabbage for about ten minutes or until tender, and then drain. Drain the contents of two 8-ounce cans of lima beans. Put alternate layers of the vegetables in a buttered baking dish, and pour over one cup of highly seasoned white sauce. Cover with buttered crumbs and bake in a moderate oven for fifteen to twenty minutes. Serves six.

Good and Cheap

Ima Dodo says she eats mock Hollandaise sauce because she can't afford mock turtle. She ought to try this recipe which combines her taste for lima beans with her economical streak:

Lima Beans and Celery with Mock Hollandaise Sauce: Heat the contents of a No. 2 can of lima beans in their liquor, and drain. Boil one and one-fourth cups diced celery until tender, and drain. Combine the two vegetables, and keep them hot. Melt two tablespoons butter, and add two tablespoons lemon juice. Beat one egg yolk, add the hot bean liquor, then add the butter and lemon juice, and cook gently until the sauce is creamy, being careful not to boil. Pour over the hot vegetables and serve at once. Serves eight.*

We are preparing a Washington and Lincoln program for Washington's birthday.

Our front board is decorated with shields and silhouettes of Washington and Lincoln.

The first grade received new books Tuesday, which they will use for their morning class.

Spelling honor roll: Beatrice, Gordon, Ferne, Raymond, Marilyn Wegge, Angeline and Marilyn

The Eighth grade class have been chosen to prepare the opening exercises this week. On Tuesday stories of Abraham Lincoln were read. This is one of the stories which were read.

Abraham Lincoln

Abraham Lincoln who was born Feb. 12, 1809 and who was the sixteenth President of the U. S. had his 125 birthday Anniversary yesterday. His poverty striken, parents, having little food or clothing, dwelt in a log cabin near a small town called Hodgenville, in Hardin county, Kentucky. He was very kind to everyone, even birds and animals. Many incidents in his life, telling of his kindness and honesty to everyone can be read. He had very little education as he had to trudge many miles to a small country school and was only able to attend a few months each year. But in spite of his little education he became a lawyer at about the age of 30 years.

Then in the year 1861 he was elected President of our country. During the first four years of his term the Civil War raged. It was during this war that Lincoln issued his great Emancipation Proclamation which proposed to free the slaves. This was soon made an amendment to our Constitution, adopted in 1865.

On April 14, 1865, shortly after his second inauguration when his trials as War President were over he was shot by an assassin, John Wilkes Booth. This occured at Ford Theater, Washington, D C. and he lingered unconcious until next morning, April, 15, when he passed away.

Attempts to assassinate Sec'y of State Seward also were made, but the assassin was unsuccessful. The character and life of Lincoln are indeed worthy of study. His career is an inspiration to the struggling of all lands. Truly he is "The Man of the Ages" as Se'cy Seward said.

No Oil In Minnesota

There are no possibilities of striking oil in Minnesoea, according to the editor of the Cokato Enterprise, who has taken the trouble to investigate with University scientists, following numerous rumors about the state of projected oil wells. Dr. G. N. Schwarts, of the department of geology at the University of Minnisota, declared emphatically in an interview that there was as much possibility of growing orange trees in the state for profit as in striking commercial oil deposits. The glacial drift in the state is not old enough—only 20,000 years old—to contain oil, and the formation below the drift containes no oil. The gas which is occasionally struck in the shallow wells of southern Minnesota comes from peat bogs and forest beds of the glacial drift, and this gas has no commercial value. Thousands of dollors haue been spent in drilling for oil in the state, including $100,000 in one well near Rochester.

Contrary to widespread belief, Govenor Olson has no jurisdiction whatsoever in the hiring or retaining of CWA workers in Minnesota. This is wholly in the hands of the Federal Re-employment Service the state head of which has been appointed by Washington. The Minnesota Civil Works Administration, of which the Governor is the head, confined to approving projects for civil works. Complaints have been flooding the Governor's office to the effect that family, personal and political factors have played an important part in the dispeneing of CWA jobs. "I'll drum any Farmer-Laborite playing politics with the CWA out of the party, "Governor Olson said. Similar action has been promised by Democrat leaders at Washington. There must be no preference shown members of any party in relief matters, according to mandates by the President and Govenonr.

Govonor Olson's plan of spreading CWA work by replacement rather than by staggering will give an even break to those who so far have failed to get work. They will get fulltime just as their predecessors did. It is an equitable arrangement and justifies the faith of the Bronson "Budget" which recently said editorially to its readers- "If you are in real need and have not been given help, don't carry a grouch because your neighbor has received help. Your turn may be next, and there's nothing gained by condemnation".

Walter Larson and family spent Sunday at St. Hilaire visiting with relatives.

Heavy Storage Losses

Heavy storage losses experienced by many potato growers this year could have been largely prevented, according to T. M. McCall of the Northwest School and Station, Crookston. Mr. McCall states that if the chief contributing causes to storage rots are understood, excessive losses can be avoided. The chief factor making for loss in potato storage is bruising of the potatoes in the digging and handling of the stock. Immature potatoes taken from hard, dry soil are often severly bruised in harvesting; such potatoes, if piled in deep bins without regard to temperature and ventilation, will deteriorate rapidly. Contaminated bins also accelerate the decay of binned potatoes.

Late planting and weather conditions the past few years have encouraged late vine growth which in turn has prevented the normal ripening of the tubers. This loss can be avoided by plantings made after June 1 generally continue until killed by frost.

Bruising of the potatoes can be kept to a minimum by; Regulating the depth of the potato digger, reducing the agitation on the digger apron, covering the ends of the apron links with belting, covering the links with rubber tubing, padding picking baskets and handling potatoes carefully.

Potato bins should be thoroly cleaned after the potatoes are removed. Partitons and floors should be scrubbed with a disinfecting solution such as blue stone (one pound to six or eight gallons of water).

Bins in which immature potatoes are stored should be of medium size and well ventilated. The moisture from the excessive transpirotion of immature potatoes saould be drawn out of the storage cellar quickly to dry the tubers before rots can gain entrance. If the temperature of the storage cellar can be lowered to 38 to 40 degrees fahrenheint as soon as the tubers are dry, but little storage loss should occur.

C. A. Davis was in town on Monday for the first time in two months, having been laid up all that time doctoring his feet, which he froze while hauling hay from Mud Lake. We are all glad to see Mr. Davis around again and wish him better luck in the future.

A. L. Carlson, manager of the Carlson Merc. Co. here; and Arvid Carlson of Middle River left Saturday for a buying trip to the Twin Cities and Chicago to secure new spring goods for their four stores.

Madelin and Harriet Hanson of Roseau visited over the week end at the Mrs. C. Hagglund and G. Sanoden homes.

Gladys Sanoden spent the week end with home folks, returning to Mentor Monday.

Fred Lorentson and family of Thief River Falls spent Sunday afternoon at the S. Lorentson home.

Bloodhounds as Trailers

"Females, as a rule, make the best trailers. They have more life, are very ambitious and intelligent and are the easiest to train. The male, as a rule, has more courage and is seldom shy in locating the person being pursued if that person conceals himself in a building or crowd. Further, he quite often attacks if the trailed person attempts to escape after being located," asserts a trainer in the Washington Star.

On the Funny Side

AN INFERENCE

During a history lesson the teacher pointed out to the class that a surname often indicated the trade of the ancestors of those who bore the name. He gave the obviously simple examples of Smith, Taylor, Baker, and others.

Then he questioned one of the boys: "What were your ancestors, Webb?"

"Spiders, sir!"—London Tit-Bits.

Proceeding Scientifically

"Guess I may as well come to it," said Farmer Corntossel.

"Come to what?"

"Studyin' the science of gettin' profit out of worthless material. I'm goin' to write to the head nurseryman of the Department of Agriculture and get him to send me one of those bulletins about graftin'."

Call a Plumber

City Boy—Say, dad, how many kinds of milk are there?

Father—Well, there's evaporated milk, buttermilk, malted milk and—but why do you wish to know?

"Oh, I'm drawing a picture of a cow and I want to know how many spigots to put on her."—Farm Journal.

Political Unrest

"Do you believe that politics makes strange bed fellows?"

"Yes," answered Senator Sorghum. "But the fact brings no repose. Trouble is always caused by the man who wants to grab all the covers and kick the other fellow out."

Proof Positive

Young Husband—It seems to me, my dear, that these pancakes are rather heavy.

His Bride—Then I'm afraid you're a poor judge, for the cookbook says they are light and feathery.

Can't Be Proved

Visitor—You say you have fourteen attorneys in this town? Any of them criminal lawyers?

Native—Well, some of 'em are. The trouble is you can't prove it on 'em—Missouri Pacific Magazine.

HIPPO STRATEGY

"The Hippos won. One of the guards swallowed the ball and scored a touchdown."

Perfect Example

Mother—Why were you kept in after school today?

Junior—The teacher told us to write an essay on "The Result of Laziness," and I turned in a blank sheet of paper.

Early Booking

He—Won't you kiss me?

She—I've sworn never to kiss a man until I'm engaged.

He—Righto! Don't forget to let me know when it comes off.

Enough to Jingle

"That's enough berserk stuff. Let those men go their way."

"Very good, sir." Tom moved slowly ahead toward the dory, Sebastien watching him warily and in silence. No doubt he was wishing there were not so many spectators for a little exhibition of knife throwing. But this was not the moment. Also, silence was golden.

Tom gave him a stony glare.

"I'll be coming ashore soon," he said. "If I meet up with you I'll tear you into rags. Get that?"

Sebastien looked as if he had got it.

"What's left of you when I get through," Tom said, "won't be worth locking up, for smashing that helmet. But that's what we'll do with the remains." He made a violent gesture. "Beat it, and keep on beating it while you've got a chance."

Sebastien gave a little shrug and went rowing out of the scene. If he felt he had a claim against Tom he did not bother with the effort to collect it.

Tom looked then at Jessica and promptly forgot Sebastien. There was the sort of glow in that girl's violet eyes that Tom had despaired of ever being able to kindle there. He could now observe it pulsate as she looked at him, the doctor having rowed up alongside. Jessica was the sort of young feminine person to be deeply stirred at the summary disposal by a suitor of a scoundrel who had been on the verge of taking the lives of her guardian and herself.

Tom, feeling himself at the same time infinitely rich and hopelessly poor, looked from Jessica to the boat buoy that floated the line to the wreck. "What's that?" he asked.

"That," said Doctor White, "is Jessica's claim to the Fourquet." He looked squarely at Robert. "Yesterday, just after leaving the island, my ward informed me that she already had located this wreck. Her reasoning was so clear that I went over and telephoned for a diver. He promised to be here at daybreak, but must have been delayed by the fog."

"He's over at the fish wharf now," Tom said, "and he was delayed by Sebastien. A little job of sabotage."

"So that's what you meant just now when you threatened to lock him up for the smashed helmet?" cried Jessica.

Tom nodded. He was wondering uncomfortably if he might not have got himself into another jam. He had taken it for granted that Doctor White must have decided to have a go at the wreck, no doubt as the result of that quick contagion of treasure seeking to which nobody seems immune, and that his operations were based on some very intelligent deduction. So here now was Tom pledged to Robert that Doctor White would, on learning all the facts, back him up in his agreement, and Doctor White acting as it appeared in behalf of Jessica, the latest claimant on the Fourquet.

The same reflection was flashed on Robert's mind. His face hardened, but he asked politely, "On what does Miss Poole base her claim, sir?"

"On that buoyed line, of course, Lieutenant."

Robert made a despairing little gesture. "But surely, sir, you don't pretend to consider the buoying of a spot where the wreck might lie as enough to constitute an actual claim?"

Doctor White smiled. "That sort of location is sufficient in the case of gold or other mineral. You have only to drive your stakes, whether or not you know the stuff is there."

"But this is different," Robert protested. "It is not—how shall I say—wild, or hitherto undiscovered. It is actual property—lost property—"

"Then what," asked Doctor White, "would you consider to constitute a really valid claim?"

"Nothing short of a line actually made fast to the wreck," Robert answered promptly.

Doctor White nodded. "Precisely my idea. But in the case of a wreck on bottom where there is no immediate danger of her breaking up, it must be evident, as you say, that a line made fast to some part of her bulk would constitute a legal claim. It would also be sufficient, I think, to entitle the holder to an injunction against anybody else's undertaking salvage operations."

"Most probably, sir," Robert admitted. "But that would be only after the line was actually made fast."

"Granted, Lieutenant. I'm glad that we are in agreement on that point." Doctor White dipped his oars, rowed several strokes to the buoy, hauled it aboard and taking a bight in the line passed it through the ringbolt in the rowboat's stern and caught two half hitches. Glancing then at Robert he said pleasantly, "I have the honor to inform you, sir, that the other end of this line is fast to the Fourquet, if indeed the hulk below us is the wreck of that vessel."

Tom gave a gasp. He was beginning to see light. The heavy woolen gown in which Jessica was completely enveloped, together with her thick damp hair, combined with his own knowledge of her amphibious abilities, already had set him thinking, but Robert so far had suspected nothing. The gown might have been merely a protection against the morning chill, and her damp hair from the fog. He cannot, therefore, be greatly blamed for suspecting a Yankee trick, especially after having been educated a little in the daring possibilities of such.

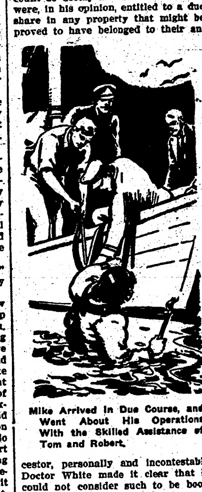
He said with a frown, but still politely, "I fail to see, sir, how this line actually can be fast to the wreck, since your diver has not yet put in an appearance. An anchor dropped over or beside the hulk would scarcely be the same thing."

"Of course not, Lieutenant," Doctor White admitted, "but such is not the case. My ward, who is an expert diver, went down about an hour ago in four fathoms of water and made the end of this line fast to a shattered plank end in the bottom of the wreck."

Tom fell back with a sort of strangled whoop. Robert stared wildly for an instant, then flung up his hands with a gesture of dismay. "Holy—mackerel!"—borrowing from Tom's list of censored expletives. Then, being really a good sport, which is to say a game loser, he added softly, "Torped!"

CHAPTER XI

It had been proposed by Doctor White that they all might save themselves unnecessary argument and discord if they were to postpone discussion of their legal, moral and other claims to whatever might be salved from the Fourquet, until such time as they might be able to estimate the value of such salvage, if any, and its character. He had admitted freely to count de Corlay and Robert that they were, in his opinion, entitled to a due share in any property that might be proved to have belonged to their ancestor, personally and incontestably. Doctor White made it clear that he could not consider such to be booty that might have been taken from enemy ships and therefore subject to estimate and fair division as spoils of war.



Mike Arrived in Due Course, and Went About His Operations With the Skilled Assistance of Tom and Robert.

The De Corlays, pere et fils, were obliged to be content with this, the point being incontestable.

Doctor White had clearly defined their position when he said, "Your own efforts, gentlemen, had nothing whatever to do with my ward's discovery of the position of the wreck. That was made before she knew anything about you or your presence here. Mr. Jordan already had made preparations for his search. He was working on a wrong theory, and Miss Poole, knowing this, would have hastened to prove the location if only to save him useless effort and expense. But we admit freely that your presence here, and what you told us, led to our deciding that there was no time to lose, and acting accordingly."

When the count seemed disposed to take up this point, Doctor White continued, "As I see it, your most considerable claim is that your son entered into an agreement of partnership with Mr. Jordan, when both of them managed by methods that were high handed but justified, I think, in disposing of Sebastien. If it had not been for their action there is no telling what might have happened. Miss Poole and I recognize that fact most fully, and desire to give it full credit. But you must yourself agree that it gives Mr. Jordan quite as strong a moral claim as any of us have."

The count looked thoughtful at this, but voiced no protest. He was sensible enough to see that legally he had scarcely any claim at all; and in any case that litigation would have been so involved as to seem hopeless. There were also other considerations, of which he was indisposed to speak.

Mike arrived in due course, and went about his operations with the skilled assistance of Tom and Robert. A section of the Fourquet's side was dynamited, and a number of articles interesting to the antiquarian recovered. The diver gained access to what evidently had been the quarters of the commanding officer, but failed to discover anything of much intrinsic worth. He found some pieces of silver plate and drinking cups, and a handsome punch bowl. Then he reported three small cannon of the culverin sort, but not as long as was customary in such guns of the Sixteenth century, which Doctor White thought from the description would have been the epoch of their casting.

Fifty Famous Frontiersmen

By

ELMO SCOTT WATSON

"Original Leather Stocking"

"THE author has often been asked if he had any original in his mind for the character of Leather-Stocking. In a physical sense, different individuals known to the writer in early life certainly presented themselves as models through his recollections; but in a moral sense this man of the forest is purely a creation."

Thus wrote J. Fenimore Cooper in the preface to his immortal "Leather-Stocking Tales," and that statement should pretty well dispose of various historical characters whose claims to being "the original Leather-Stocking" have been advanced from time to time. One of them is Tim Murphy, the famous Morgan Rifleman and Scout of the Schoharie.

But if you would look upon a faithful likeness of the man who probably was most in Cooper's mind as he created the character "Leather-Stocking" in "The Pioneers" (the first published of the Leather-Stocking Tales) or "Deerslayer" in the book of that name, go to the town of Caroga, N. Y., and gaze upon the heroic bronze statue of Nicholas Stoner which stands looking out over Canada lake.

The son of old Henry Stoner, a pioneer settler of Broadalbin, N. Y., young Nick became a crack shot with the long rifle almost as soon as he was big enough to carry one. At the age of fifteen he enlisted in the Continental army with his father and brother and fought at Saratoga, Oriskany, in the Rhode Island campaign, was at Valley Forge and shared in the triumph at Yorktown.

Toward the close of the Revolution old Henry Stoner returned home only to be killed and scalped by the Indians and leave to his sons a heritage of hatred for the red men. After the war Nick Stoner became the most celebrated hunter and trapper in New York and his fame was spread by Simms in his book, "The Trappers of New York."

At the outbreak of the War of 1812 he marched away to battle again, serving for three years, most of the time as chief of scouts for General Dodge of the New York militia. When the war was over he went back to his hunting and trapping, and his friendship with Cooper during this period adds plausibility to the theory that he was the principal "original" of Cooper's famous frontier character. Although he served in many county offices until his death in 1853, the statue which stands at Caroga is the best symbol of his place in history—as a hunter, a trapper, an Indian fighter and as nearly the personification as any man ever was of the typical frontiersman created by a great American novelist—"Leather-Stocking."

Leader of the Lost Trappers

ONE of the most romantic stories of the Old West is that of Capt. Ezekiel Williams and his "Lost Trappers." The story had its beginnings in the Lewis and Clark expedition when those two famous explorers, upon their return to St. Louis, brought with them a Mandan Indian chief, named Big White. The chief was royally entertained in St. Louis but in a short time he asked to be sent home.

An escort of 20 men was enlisted for this duty and they were placed in command of Capt. Ezekiel Williams. On April 25, 1807, they set out from St. Louis and proceeded up the Missouri until Big White was once more among the Mandans. This duty done they could have returned to St. Louis. But Williams and his men had another idea and that was to "explore the country on the waters of the Missouri, to trap for beaver and even to penetrate and cross the Rocky mountains."

So on up into the Yellowstone country they went. There they were set upon by hostile Blackfeet and lost five of their number. Retreating southward, they fell in with the Crows, who killed five more of their number and took all of their horses.

The party, now reduced to ten men, hastened on foot toward the headwaters of the South Platte where they hoped to find a better pass through the mountains than Lewis and Clark had found. That winter and the next spring the remnant of the expedition spent near the sources of the Arkansas river and here they fell in with hostile Comanches who picked off their men, one by one, until at last only three of the original 20 were left. These three were Captain Williams, James Workman and Samuel Spencer.

By this time they had no idea of which direction to take to reach a settlement. Captain Williams was sure they were on the Red river but the other two were equally certain that they were not far from Santa Fe. So they decided to separate. Williams continued down the river and eventually reached Fort Cooper on the Missouri.

Workman and Spencer headed toward the Wind river mountains and in a short time were hopelessly lost in the wilderness. After many weeks of wandering they finally struck the Colorado river and fell in with a Mexican caravan which took them to Upper California. The following spring they went to Santa Fe, where they remained as traders for the next 15 years. History has forgotten them now but they should be remembered—as the first Americans to float upon the waters of the Rio Colorado and the first to cross the Rocky mountains south of Lewis and Clark's pass.

TOO MANY WAIT FOR A MIRACLE!

Explaining Lack of Effort to Fight Weakness.

In Vienna recently the police had to be called out to cope with the crowds at the funeral of a rabbi who had a reputation for performing miracles.

From across the border in Hungary, Poland, Rumania and Czechoslovakia, tens of thousands came, hoping that at his open grave the spirit of the holy man would secure for them their heart's desire.

All who felt that what meant happiness for them could be attained only through a miracle, took their last hope to his funeral. At the end a sack was flung into the grave. In it were thousands of written requests for miracles.

So in this day and age there are people who pin their faith in miracles.

When we stop to think about it, it comes to us that this is true not only of the simple folk of still medieval regions. Many of us right here, while we do not follow miracle workers or send notes to spirits, still do hope for miracles to bring us happiness. We may not do this consciously. But what other explanation is there for the lack of effort on our own part to make our way of life conducive to the happiness we seek?

We all know in our own hearts, of qualities within ourselves that militate against our enjoyment of content and happiness. We know things we do that hurt us, or those we love, which is the same thing. And yet, do we fight those weaknesses, uproot those faults? No. For the most part we just go along, living in the same way from day to day, falling short of the realization of inner joy that should be ours, putting off happiness. Surely, we must be waiting for a miracle!

RESOLUTION

A Resolution pertaining to the issuance of $27,000.00 Refunding Bonds

WHEREAS this district has an outstanding bonded indebtedness in excess of 20 per cent of the assessed valuation of all taxable property, exclusive of Moneys and and Credits in said District, and—

WHEREAS of the outstanding bonds there are $15,000.00 bonds dated September 1st, 1919 bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent maturing September 1st, 1934, and $12,000.00 bond dated February 1st, 1921 bearing 7 per cent interest due February 1st, 1936, and it will be impossible for the District to continue to pay interest on said bonds at these excessive rates, and to meet the principal of said bonds as the same now mature, and it is necessary for an orderly retirement of such bonds that the same be refunded into serial bonds at a lower rate of interest owing to the necessity of keeping the tax rate down in view of a large decrease in the assessed valuation and a heavy increase in tax delinquency which has arisen in the past few years,

Cheese Attains Proper Rank

Home Economics Experts Appraise This Food as of Outstanding Value; Most Nutritious When Served With Vegetables or Fruit.

I wonder, says a prominent culinary expert, if you realize how much more cheese you are using in your household than used to be the custom. If you consider how many different ways you are using it in your weekly meal plan you will realize that you are using a larger amount than you once did.

Once upon a time we thought of cheese as an accompaniment for pie, as a filler for sandwiches and as an occasional accompaniment to crackers to serve after or as dessert. Now we are using it as an ingredient of many luncheon dishes, as a flavoring for soup and vegetables and even as an ingredient of bread and biscuits.

The bureau of home economics of the Department of Agriculture calls attention to the fact that cheese is one of the outstanding protein foods which, besides being economical, also brings variety and flavor to meals.

The bureau states:

"The allowance for a family of five is from five to seven pounds of lean meat, liver, fish, cheese and eggs each week, in the low cost food guide developed by the bureau. This is not a large quantity and it must be divided among the five groups and must be spread over seven days. It requires ingenuity to decide which ones to buy and how to use them in order to avoid undesirable monotony in serving inexpensive meals.

"Comparatively speaking, the foods in this group are the highest in price. Consequently, the quantity of these foods in a dietary so inexpensive is less than is normally found in the average diet. Some proteins may be supplied in cheaper forms, but meat, cheese, fish and eggs cannot be ignored. They add flavor, interest and efficient protein to a diet likely to become monotonous if made up largely of cereals and legumes."

The bureau calls attention to the fact that American cheese and cottage cheese are the two least expensive forms of cheese available in this country. The former is a commercial product made from milk and ripened, while the latter is usually home made and unripened. It has been estimated that an inch cube of American cheese has a fuel value greater than an egg and equal to an ounce of porterhouse or sirloin steak and that it supplies as much protein as the latter. The food value of cottage cheese is similar.

The popularity of macaroni and cheese is well founded, the bureau says; the flavor is pleasing and the macaroni, which is a cereal product, supplies starch and carbohydrates, which cheese lacks. But the nutrition experts of the bureau say that to balance the meal some food, such as tomatoes, lettuce, spinach or fruit, should be served with this dish and, in fact, with all cheese dishes.

"Mild flavored cheeses may be eaten in quantity, while the 'sharper' varieties are more suitable for flavoring foods which lack savor. Cottage cheese can be served in many pleasing ways other than as a salad, and the bureau has developed some interesting recipes for utilizing this inexpensive food. It may be used as a filler for sandwiches, combined with nuts, vegetables, relishes and meats. Cottage-cheese pie and old Dutch cheese cake are two old favorites. It may also be made into a loaf and baked in the oven, made into patties and into balls that are fried in deep fat."

Cheese and Bean Loaf With Tomato Sauce.

1 pound kidney beans or
1 cup dried beans, cooked until tender
1 cup grated cheese
1 small onion
1 cup soft bread crumbs
Salt
Pepper

Put the beans and onion through a meat chopper. Add the cheese and seasonings and sufficient bread crumbs to make the mixture stiff enough to be formed into a roll. Bake in a moderate oven until delicately browned, basting with hot water combined with 2 tablespoons fat. Serve hot with tomato sauce.

Dutch Cheese Cake.

3½ tablespoons flour
¾ cup sugar
⅓ cup milk
2 eggs
1 cup cottage cheese
Lemon juice and rind
Mace or nutmeg

Mix the flour thoroughly with the sugar, slowly add the milk and cook until thickened, stirring constantly. Take from stove and stir in the cottage cheese, well-beaten eggs and flavoring. Bake in a shallow greased dish for 25 minutes in a moderate oven. This makes a very firm custard. Serve cold.

Cottage Cheese Patties.

2 tablespoons finely chopped onion
2 tablespoons fat
2 cups cottage cheese
2 cups dry bread crumbs or
1 cup cooked rice and 1 cup bread crumbs
¼ cup peanut butter
Salt
Pepper

Cook the onion in the fat until tender, but not brown. Mix with other ingredients and salt and pepper to season. Form into flat cakes and dust lightly with fine bread or cracker crumbs or cornmeal. Fry a delicate brown in a little fat in a hot frying pan. The mixture should be stiff since the cheese tends to soften during the cooking.

BIG PART PLAYED BY LIBRARIES IN TROUBLED WORLD

Foreign scholars, addressing American Library association members at their Chicago convention, asserted that libraries are essential to the "existence of a democratic society" and the "continuity of civilization." Arundell H. Esdaile, vice president of the British Library association, urging free access to books for maintaining democracy "directed by good judgment," said: "The remarkable rise of the public library in the last generation is the healthiest omen for the future, even the material future, of our troubled world that I can conceive, short of the miraculous appearance of some one who could understand, and with authority interpret, economic phenomena." Monsignor Eugene Tisserant, director of Rome's Vatican library, said that "preservation of records of scholarship means continuity of civilization in a world submitted to continuous changes."

Educational aspects of libraries was emphasized by Louis S. Shores, of Fisk university, who asserted that "ultimately college education is book education." Superior students are bored by classrooms and inferior students fail to comprehend professors' thought, said Mr. Shores. "It is the classroom as much as any other factor which has tended to a level of mediocrity of achievement for all," he said, in advocating a "library college," wherein students would find their own problems and bring them for discussion to the group room, which would be merely supplementary to the library. In this manner, Mr. Shores told delegates, "the student's rate of learning would be limited only by his own ability."—Indianapolis News.

Beauty Standards Set Forth by Great Artist

To be beautiful a woman must have seven certain qualifications. And these seven little items, listed by the classic Spanish painter Velasquez of the Sixteenth century, are: White, black, red, slender, little, broad and soft. According to Velasquez's standard, to be beautiful a woman must possess: white skin, teeth and hands; black eyes, eyebrows and eyelids; red cheeks, lips and nails; slender body, arms and legs; small teeth, ears and feet; soft hair, lips and hands; and a broad breast, forehead and root of the nose.

Perhaps it will give his "beauty standard" a little more weight if we add that Diego Rodriguez Velasquez was the head of the Spanish school of painting and was one of the greatest painters the world has ever known. He lived from 1599 to 1660. That was a long time ago, but his beauty guide still seems to hold true. Of course they didn't have platinum blondes in those days, silly!—Pathfinder Magazine.

TURKS OWE BIG DEBT TO KEMAL

Has Lifted Race to Equality Among Nations.

Turkey has been celebrating a miracle. Ten years ago Mustapha Kemal Pasha began the remaking of Turkey. Today Turkey is re-made.

Of course there is more work to be done before Kemal's vision is fully realized. It remains a fact that the change is next to incredible.

Ten years ago Turkey was essentially oriental and so backward that no one believed its modernization possible. Now Turkey is both European and modern.

Gone are the fezzes that made the Turks a people apart. Gone are the harems, gone are the veils; the Turkish women no longer deem themselves loveliest when they are fattest and laziest, but they are going strongly for trim figures and pretty clothes and jobs. Gone is the ancient idea that higher education consists in sitting on a mat and memorizing the Koran. The common schools are like European schools, and the universities are occidental in their methods. Even the difficult Arabic alphabet has been abolished. Turkish, which has no affinity to Arabic, is now written with a special Turkish alphabet based on the Latin alphabet of western Europe.

Ten years ago the peasant scratched the earth with a wooden plow. There were no manufactures. There was no merchant marine. Now the Anatolian farmers use modern implements, factories have come into being, and ships flying the Turkish flag ply plentifully in Levantine waters.

The most astounding achievement is Kemal's emphatic repudiation of the almost universal dictum that the Turks are an inherently inferior race. The world has long known that the Ottoman is a first-class fighting man and a "square shooter," but under the rule of the sultans he was so deeply sunk in ignorance and so hopelessly handicapped by vicious misgovernment that he seemed incapable of intellectual betterment. Kemel's fundamental assumption was that the Turk is not inferior and that, with an equal chance, he would prove himself the equal of the races which despised him. It was an inspiration, and the subsequent leadership of Kemal has been no less than inspired.

The fact that Kemal is still a comparatively young man adds to the marvel. The fact that, unlike Mussolini and Hitler, he is nothing of a poseur, but works quietly, without ostentation, without attitudes or mummery or hullabaloo, makes Mustapha Kemal Pasha the most interesting of today's dictators. His achievements stamp him as the ablest—Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

Keep "Tab" on Heart

Declaring that germ diseases are being brought under control, but that heart troubles are increasing, Dr. Franz M. Groebel, said to be the greatest heart specialist, gave this advice during a recent visit to Los Angeles: "Don't worry nor hurry; eat regularly but not too much; smoke if you wish but use mild tobacco; drink a quart of water a day; exercise in the open air daily, and take a short nap in the middle of the day and, if possible, take two days vacation a week." During the last 25 years, heart failure has increased from 20.6 to 26.14 per 10,000 population and is now the disease aged people have most reason to fear.—Ransome Sutton, in the Los Angeles Sunday Times.

THE DIFFICULTY

The man shook his head sadly.

"See that plot of land over there?" he said to his companion. "Last year I could have bought it for a mere song. It's now worth over twenty pounds a foot."

"I suppose you couldn't sing?" said his friend, lightly enough.

The other sniffed, "I could sing, all right, but I couldn't get the right notes."—Answers Magazine.

Social Code Concerning Courtesy Owed Hostess

The approach to friendships is one of the things which determines our pleasure in it. Sometimes a chance happening throws people together through some incident, or possibly club affiliations through similarity of interests is the reason for meeting. What pace a friendship shall take, that is how rapidly it shall move from the attitude of acquaintances to that of intimate friends, the two persons can govern. But there is a third way of making friends that has an entirely different set of rules. When two persons meet at the home of a mutual friend, good taste dictates that they shall be followed.

An unwritten law exists in the social code which is not less important because many persons disobey it. They are criticized, and rightly, when they do. The host or hostess, under whose roof the new acquaintances meet, should be included in the first invitation given the new friend. If that host or hostess cannot be reached when an invitation is telephoned, a letter should go saying that the effort was made to reach him or her, and why. To let this information be picked up through outside sources is to break at least one link of friendship with the hostess.

There is no reason why those who meet at a social occasionally in a friend's home should, on that account, take pains to avoid each other. But the first courtesy is owed to the hostess, in fact, one might almost say, the first allegiance. When a subsequent party is arranged which deliberately precludes the first friend, especially if the one invited is a man, it can hardly be overlooked. To some it would seem that this circumstance is inconceivable. In the experience of the writer it has been met occasionally and offense given.

No course but to remain dignified is permitted the first hostess, if she is to appear at her best. Whatever her viewpoint on the matter, that is her own affair. An increase of formality, and decline of intimacy is a tactful way of indicating that one's ethics have been applied to the situation. Of course, if the expected courtesies are extended to the hostess at the outset, she will not attempt to keep her former guests from being as close friends as they may wish to be.

"Rejuvenating" Cattle

Prof. Eugen Steinach has replaced his famous surgical operation for rejuvenation by injections of a highly concentrated form of the sex hormone, progynon, in combating sterility among cattle in Switzerland. The condition is of comparatively frequent occurrence in the highly bred Swiss cattle.

The reports of Professor Steinach's latest work recall that Gertrude Atherton wrote a novel about rejuvenation of women, and called it Black Oxen, it is pointed out by Science Service. She probably did not anticipate the curious twist which scientists have now given her book and its title by performing rejuvenation operations to cure sterility in Swiss cows which, if not black oxen, are at least their near relatives.—Literary Digest.

New Deal Money Bill Put Through Senate—Secretary Perkins Proposes Federal Tax for Permanent Dole Funds—Polish-German Peace Treaty.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

YIELDING by a large majority to the President's demands, the senate passed his New Deal money bill, inserting only a few noncontroversial amendments to which the house readily agreed. The administration's victory was decisive and was preceded by the rejection of two major proposals which were obnoxious to Mr. Roosevelt and his financial advisors. The first of these provided that control of the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund should be given to a board of five instead of to the secretary of the treasury. This was defeated by the votes of 50 Democrats, three "radical" Republicans and the single Farmer-Labor senator. The second amendment offered was put forward by the silver bloc and was beaten only by the assistance of 17 Republican senators, for 28 Democrats were recorded in favor of it and the vote stood 43 to 45. It would have provided for the purchase and remonetization of silver.

Senator Glass

The final vote on the measure was 66 to 23. One lone Democrat had the nerve to stand out against the administration and uphold by his vote his convictions, although several others had opposed the bill in debate. The man who was true to himself was Carter Glass of Virginia, secretary of treasury under Wilson and co-author of the federal reserve act. Senator Gore of Oklahoma was paired against the measure but did not vote. Senator McAdoo of California had done a lot of opposition talking but quit with that and went into the "aye" column. All of the independent Republicans and Shipstead, Farmer-Laborite, supported the bill.

Though the money bill has been summarized before in this column, it may be well to state again its main provisions, as follows:

The treasury is given title to all the nation's monetary gold stocks, including $3,500,000,000 held by the federal reserve banks.

The President is authorized to revalue the dollar at 50 to 60 per cent of its present statutory gold equivalent.

Coinage of gold is declared at an end. The metal is to be held in bullion form in the treasury as backing for paper currency.

The $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund is created out of the increased value of the gold accruing as a result of devaluation of the dollar. It is placed in the sole charge of the secretary of the treasury and he is given authority to expend it in virtually any transactions he may deem necessary for stabilizing the dollar abroad.

In addition, the bill removes several present restrictions upon the issuance of government securities, provides that any type of government obligation may be purchased with any other type, that securities issued may be sold privately, and authorizes the issuance of $2,500,000,000 additional treasury notes.

It was expected that President Roosevelt would act quickly in devaluing the dollar and setting up the stabilization board.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S administration has proposed to congress legislation that would bring the stock and commodity exchanges of the country under the rigid control of the federal government. The President's interdepartmental committee has made suggestions for the federal licensing of those markets and the creation of a governmental agency with extraordinary powers to regulate their operations. The banking and currency committees of the senate and house have these recommendations under consideration as a basis for legislation soon to be introduced.

The interstate commerce committee of the house is working on legislation, also proposed by the interdepartmental committee, that will make the country's communications systems subject to similar regulation by the federal government.

PERMANENT dole funds in all the states, created mainly by a new federal tax upon all employers, is the latest plan of Miss Frances Perkins, secretary of labor. Her scheme, which is rather complicated, provides for the levying of the tax on the basis of employers' pay rolls, beginning on July 1, 1935, and calls on all state legislatures to set up unemployment funds in each commonwealth. The employer would be given the choice of paying the full tax or contributing voluntarily to the fund in his state. The plan is being put into the form of a bill to be introduced in congress. Co-operating with Secretary Perkins are Senator Wagner of New York and Representative David J. Lewis of Maryland.

Sec'y Perkins

The Perkins announcement stressed the point that the bill would not provide a federal unemployment insurance plan, concerning which there might be some question of legality.

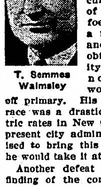
"The proposed federal tax bill," read the formal announcement, "will work in such a way as to promote the speedy passage of state unemployment insurance laws.

"The federal bill will not define what kind of laws the states shall pass. Wisconsin is the only state which now has an unemployment insurance law, but measures are pending in many other states."

STILL determined that the civil works and relief programs shall be discontinued on May 1 if possible, the President has asked congress to appropriate $950,000,000 more so they can be carried on to that date. In a letter to Speaker Rainey Mr. Roosevelt said both agencies would soon be out of money, and experts have figured that if more is not provided, about 17,000,000 persons will be dropped from the pay rolls and relief lists.

WHILE President Roosevelt was celebrating his fifty-second birthday with relatives and close personal friends in the White House, many thousands of his fellow citizens were enjoying parties, balls and other entertainments arranged to mark the anniversary. These took place in hundreds of cities, towns and villages all over the country, and the proceeds will be turned over to the Warm Springs Foundation for Victims of Infantile Paralysis, in which the President has been deeply interested for years.

SENATOR HUEY P. LONG of Louisiana sustained another severe blow in the New Orleans Democratic mayoral primary, which is equivalent to an election. The "Kingfish's" candidate, John Klorer, was soundly beaten by T. Semmes Walmsley, the present incumbent and now one of Long's bitterest foes. There was a third candidate and Walmsley did not obtain a clear majority, but Klorer announced that he would not force a run-off primary. His chief issue in the race was a drastic reduction in electric rates in New Orleans, and as the present city administration has promised to bring this about, Klorer said he would take it at its word.



T. Semmes Walmsley

Another defeat for Long was the finding of the congressional committee in the contest between Mrs. Bolivar E. Kemp and Jared Y. Sanders for the seat of the late Representative Kemp. The "Kingfish" ardently supported Mrs. Kemp and the election was so replete with scandal that the committee recommended that neither aspirant be seated. The house adopted this report.

OUTSTANDING in current foreign news is the fact that Germany and Poland have signed a peace pact that is to endure for ten years. The treaty stipulates that during that period under no conditions is force to be used in relations between these countries. The successful negotiation of this pact is considered a great triumph for Joseph Lipski, Poland's minister to Germany, and for Foreign Minister Joseph Beck, and the jubilant Poles assert that their nation must now be considered one of the great powers of Europe. They are especially proud of the way in which they have blocked the plans of Maxim Litvinov, foreign commissar of Russia, who was trying to combine with Poland for a protectorate over the Baltic states. They appeared to be going along with him but were secretly conducting the negotiations with Berlin.

According to European correspondents, one reason for Germany's radical change of policy toward Poland is Warsaw's disinclination to become in any way involved with the problem of Austria, which is expected there to turn Nazi in the near future. Polish statesmen privately state Poland does not oppose the Austro-German anschluss (union). They claim once this is accomplished the question of obtaining a port on the Adriatic sea would become more important to Germany than the return of the Polish corridor.

Announcement of the Polish-German treaty created a sensation in Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, all of which countries have quarrels with Germany and had been relying on Poland's support.

IN A brilliant ceremony in St. Peter's the pope beatified three Jesuit priests who were martyred by Indians in South America more than three hundred years ago. They were Fathers Rocco Gonzales, Alfonso Rodriguez and Juan del Castillo, who were killed in 1628 after establishing collective farming groups of the natives.

LIFE IN COUNTRY SHOWN TO HAVE MANY ADVANTAGES

"Increased earnings and enjoyment of country life are the principal advantages of living in the country, and transportation costs and lack of conveniences are the chief disadvantages.

These reasons were given most frequently by 700 part-time farmers in six New York counties, says Kenneth Hood of the New York State College of Agriculture, who is making a study of the advantages of the rural home for the city worker.

Locations on hard-surfaced roads are preferred because of lower transportation costs, more modern conveniences and opportunities to cater to tourist trade and to sell garden produce at roadside stands.

Newcomers from the city say that actual living costs in the country are about $250 a year lower than in the city, and that the chief reduction is in house rent. Also garden, poultry and dairy products supplement the regular income.

"A few acres of good soil prove the best investment and a large acreage of poor, abandoned land the most disastrous," Mr. Hood says. He also points out that "the experiences of these part-time farmers show that it is more economical to buy a farm with buildings than it is to buy land and build on it, and that city persons might do well to rent for a year or two before buying."

The six New York counties covered in Mr. Hood's survey are Albany, Chemung, Rensselaer, Saratoga, Schenectady and Tompkins counties.

Read the "Ads" but don't ignore medical opinion
if you want to
-relieve constipation gently and safely
-take the exact dose suited to your need
-avoid danger of bowel strain
A doctor will tell you that the careless use of harsh laxatives will often do more harm than good.
Harsh laxatives often drain the system, weaken the bowel muscles, and even affect the liver and kidneys.
Fortunately, the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form.
Can Constipation be safely relieved?
"Yes!" say medical men. "Yes!" say thousands who have followed this sensible medical advice: 1. Select a good liquid laxative. 2. Take the dose that you find suited to your system. 3. Gradually reduce the dose until bowels are moving regularly without assistance.
Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a prescriptional preparation containing senna, a natural vegetable laxative which relieves constipation gently and safely. Why not try it? Some pill or tablet may be more convenient to carry. But there is no "convenience" in any cathartic that's taken so frequently, you must carry it wherever you go!
What is the "Right" Laxative?
In buying any laxative, read the label. Not the claims, but the contents. If it contains doubtful drugs, don't take it. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin contains no mineral drugs. By using it, you avoid danger of strain.
How many dimes and quarters are spent on "popular" laxatives! How quickly they count up, if you frequently use habit-forming helps! A bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin would save you money—and bring you real relief.
Why Doctors give a liquid laxative
The habitual use of harsh salts, or powerful drugs in the highly concentrated form of pills or tablets is risky.
The properly prepared liquid laxative will bring a perfect movement without discomfort or injury. You need not take a "double dose" a day or two later.
The public can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store.

Annual Creamery Meeting Held

The stockholders of the Farmers Cooperative Creamery held their 27th annual meeting here on Thursday of last week. A good sized crowd that filled all the sitting room in the hall was in attendance.

John P. Augustine, president of the board of directors presided.

T. B. Folden, F. D. Voth and E. O. Waagedahl were reelected to serve on the board of directors.

Many questions of interest to the creamery patrons were discussed and explained.

R. J. Lund, Thief River Falls, who audited the books for the creamery, was here and explained the financial statement he had set up. He brought out many points that some of the patrons do not get the full understanding of as listed on the statement but, which, has to be put there in order so as to get the books to balace according to assets and liabilities.

Stuart McLeod of Thief River Falls, a director for Land O' Lakes for this district was here and gave a very interesting talk on the activities and earnings of that organization for the past year.

Mr. McLeod made the statement that the patrons of the creamery here shonld feel happy to know that they have the best buttermaker in this district for manager at the local creamery.

The fieldman recommeded Mr. Larson for this place and left it to him to pull the creamery out of the tight place it had fallen into.

We are sorry to write that for the first time since the creamery was organized, it had a loss instead of a gain in operation at the end of the year.

Some of the loss it was stated, was due to a faulty scale, some on account of the creamery selling butter back to the patrons to cheap. In both cases of this the patrons have already gotten the benifit. The balance of the $1,052.66 loss, it was pointed out, was made up af many items with the heaviest share falling on the carelessness and poor management by the former buttermaker.

The Holt Community Band furnished a program of music. Free lunch was served after the meeting to only those whom were interested enough to stay until it was adjourned.

The people of the United States became world-concious with the plunging of this country into the world war. Keep Your High Quality

One of the best paying investments in the dairy is the high quality of your milk. Just that little extra care that you bestow upon the milk is a real asset.

Care bestowed upon the individual cow in a clean and sanitary dairy barn, and on the milk for market, are real assets. You will find that the test and the general returns will more than give you an added profit.

Valentine Is Sent To Farmers

Tender Missive Hidden In Vote Against Tax On Imported Fats

Washington, D. C., Feb. 14—This was Valentine's day and the "farmers' friends" in Congress sent him one to show him how much they love him. It was a rather expensive affair — for the farmer — but what do his friends in Congress care for expense when they are wooing the farmer?

The $258,000,000 tax bill came up in the House on Valentine's Day. A special rule was offered which, if adopted, would have prevented any amendmends to the bill except by the Ways and Means Committee. The measure, among other items, provides for an excise tax of 5 cents a pound on cocoanut and sesame oil. It also hoisted the rate of income tax on the wealthy and lowered it on the smaller incomes, and cut out the loopholes whereby Morgan and his crowd escaped all income tax for years.

Naturally, it would be expected that the self-styled "friends of the farmer" would rush to see that such a bill was passed without change and that they would vote for the special rule that guarded it from change. They must have known that a powerful and well-heeled lobby was here battling for the aleomargarine and the soap trust and that another even stronger and better heeled lobby was out to crack the bill so that it could not "soak the rich," as they said.

On the roll call three Minnesota Congressmen voted to keep the bill unchanged. They were Hoidale, Democrat, and Knutson and Christianson, Republicans. Where were the professed friends of the farmer? Congressmen Kvale, Lundeen, Johnson, Arens and Shoemaker, Farmer-Labor, and Congressman Chase, Republican of Minnesota, and Lemke, Non-partisan Republican of North Dakota who voted to open the bill to changes and give the soap and oleomargarine trusts a chance to cut out the 5c tax on imported fats and oils! Some Valentine.

What did that mean to the farmer? If the change could have been made, the farmers' butterfat, lard and tallow would remain in competition with the imported oil from the cocoanut tree and that eastern grain, sesame. But the House would not keep butter, lard and other products of the American farm at the present low price. It voted 241 to 154 to permit no amendments.

Denouncing Wall Street is a favorite campaign sport of the farmers' champions. That does not seem to interfere with their ability to vote to permit the Morgan crowd to get in their fine work--as they have done before--to escape income tax. Weeping on the farmers' shoulder over his sad plight occasioned by the low price he is getting for his fats does not need to go so far as to cause the said weepers to vote in Congress to protect the farmer against low priced oils and fats. The oleomargarine trust needs a little sympathy once in a while.

What will be the excuse given by Messrs. Johnson, Shoemaker, Arens, Lundeen, Kvale, Chase and Lemke for their vote? That's easy. They will explain that they could not vote for "gag" rule. That's such an old gag, they should have their fingers crossed when they spring it. The farmer, in the past, has been the victem of the gag rule. Now when there is one chance to use it in his favor these gentlemen are to sanctimonious to give the farmer a break. That's gagging on a gnat and swallowing a camel, for fair!

Will they vote for the bill? Undoubtedly! They'll come home and brag about it. But they won't dwell much on voting to lay the bill wide open to amendment on the floor of the House so that the oleomargarine surgeons could cut out its vitals. Nor will they say that Congressman Harold Knutson, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, managed to get the 5 cent excise tax provision in the bill. Why should they?—he's not their kind of a farmers' friend. Nor will they mention Congressman Hoidale who stood by the farmer and blows no horn on the street corner to call attention to it—as the Pharisees do. Nor will they mention Congressman Christianson's stand—they'll be so busy denouncing the "interests" thas they'll forget all about the man's part he played.

This was the most significant vote in this session of Congress. It should show who is the real friend of agriculture. It shows that lip service does not count. Here was a little piece of fat for the farmer. Others are just as hard up as the farmer. Was there some grease in it for them? Is that the milk in the cocoanut.

Gift to City of Washington

The park known as Meridian Hill, a gift to the city of Washington, includes about ten acres. The cost was $470,000. It was bought by the United States government under condemnation proceedings. It appears that there was not sufficient money to purchase the ground and the late Colonel Blount, an old resident of Washington, made up the deficiency.

Filed For Congressman

Ole O. Sageng, of Dalton, has filed as a Republican candidate for congress from the ninth district.

Mr. Sageng was born in Norway in 1871 and came to America in 1878, since which time he has lived on a farm near Dalton in Otter Tail county. He was elected to the house of representatives in 1900, and to the state senate in 1906. He served in the senate continuously for sixteen years when he retired voluntarily. In 1924 he was a candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator, and altho he received general support throughout the state he was defeated by the adverse vote of the big cities. In 1925 he was appointed chairman of the Rural Credit Bureau and served in that capacity for six years.

Mr. Sageng was married in 1904 to Miss Carrie Branvold of Dalton. They have eight children.

CWA Project Here Closed

The local CWA project was cancelled on Tuesday according to Gilbert Sanoden, local foreman. He stated that the reason given for discontinuance here, is that they are forced by orders to cut the crews ten per cent this week or about a hundred men in Marshall County.

New orders come from the state CWA at all times and it may be cut for good.

The village had a lot of very much needed graveling done and also got their half mile of road going east a half a mile south of town, graveled. The expense to the local taxpayers for gravel and dynamite will be about a hundred dollars.

On the Funny Side

WORSE STILL

They were discussing a mutual friend.

"Brown is a good fellow, really," said Jones, "but he treats his poor wife miserably."

This seemed to surprise Grey.

"What do you mean?" he asked. "Does he beat her?"

"No, no!" said Jones. "He just refuses to argue with her."

Devaluation of Dollar Brings Flood of Gold to America—NRA and Steel Industry—Planning for More Foreign Loans.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

DEVALUATION of the dollar, and the purchase of gold at $35 a fine ounce caused a turmoil in the world's money markets and an immediate result was a great flow of gold bullion from Europe to the United States. The pound sterling and the franc made gains, but not big enough to suit President Roosevelt and his monetary advisers. Later both the pound and franc declined again, and the confusion was made greater. The French were alarmed by the drain on their gold and expressed intense resentment against the American policy, charging that the administration was making deliberate efforts to embarrass France.

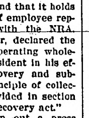
Prof. Warren

For the time being the administration was prevented from driving the dollar down to its projected parity points in foreign exchanges by the rising tide of American dollars flowing back to this country. But most of its financial experts were confident that the 59.06 cents value would be made to prevail after a reasonable time to allow for the shakedown. As for the $35 an ounce for gold, it is the opinion of Prof. George F. Warren, chief deviser of the experiment that is under way, that the figure must be raised if prices of commodities are to be put up materially. Frank E. Gannett, the Rochester newspaper publisher, after a visit to the White House and talking with both the President and Professor Warren, said in his Rochester Times-Union that he had been convinced by those conversations "that we shall continue to raise the price of gold" and that the $35 figure probably would succeed only in preventing prices from slipping and could hardly be expected to raise them much.

By the President's devaluation stroke a treasury deficit of $1,900,000,000 was transformed overnight into a surplus of $973,710,937. The cut in gold content of the dollar produced a dollar profit of $2,805,512,060.87 as of February 1 and a record cash balance of $4,434,713,155.18, pending deduction of the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund.

The profit on the gold was paid into the general fund of the treasury, and the new dollar value of the treasury gold supply was written into the books at $7,018,263,925.70. The surplus did not alter the official outlook for a deficit of approximately that amount at the close of the current fiscal year, June 30, in view of the extraordinary expenditures of the President's recovery program.

NRA and the steel industry came into sharp conflict, and the NRA to a certain extent backed down. Executives of all the leading steel companies met and considered the claim of the national labor board to authority given by the President to conduct elections for employee representatives when a "substantial" number request that action. To this the steel men took exception. They issued a statement saying the industry intends "to resist all attacks" upon company unions and that it holds that the present plan of employee representation complies with the NRA. The statement, however, declared the steel industry "is co-operating wholeheartedly with the President in his efforts for national recovery and subscribes fully to the principle of collective bargaining as provided in section 7 (a) of the national recovery act."



Gen. Johnson

The NRA had given out a press statement implying that all company unions are dominated by employers. This drew sharp criticism, and the statement was retracted. Administrator Johnson and NRA Counsel Donald Richberg upheld the right of the labor board as stated above. They asserted, however, that the executive order which said that representatives elected by a majority of workers "have been thereby designated to represent all the employees," does not abridge the rights of labor minorities to conduct negotiations with employers.

It was indicated unofficially that this reference was made to prevent either side from claiming an election unrepresentative because its adherents stayed away from the polls. The NRA statement said that while selection of majority representatives does not restrict legal rights of smaller groups to deal separately with employees, "as a practical proposition," neither the employer nor the labor board could be expected to deal with "an indefinite number of employee representatives expressing every possible variety of opinion."

SENATOR BORAH of Idaho, carrying on his attack on abrogation of the anti-trust laws by the NRA, won the approval of the senate for a resolution calling for a report, from the federal trade commission on price fixing by the steel companies under the NRA code. This report already has been made to the President but it has not been given to the public. The Borah resolution also asked for a study of increases in gasoline prices.

ONLY one representative voted "no" when the house of representatives passed on the bill to appropriate $950,000,000 for continuation of CWA and direct relief activities. The lone opponent was Representative George B. Terrill of Texas, Democrat. The money is to be used by the federal emergency relief administration for keeping up the federal dole to the idle for another year and for continuing the Civil Works administration until the early part of May. About 500 millions is to be used for the former purpose, it was said, and about 450 for the CWA.

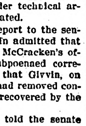
WITH little debate the senate passed the bill introduced by Senator Hiram Johnson of California which is designed to prevent the floating in America of private loans to countries now defaulting on past debts. Before passing it, the senators amended the measure so that it would not hamper the President's new scheme to grant to foreign nations loans with which to buy American goods. A proviso was written in declaring that loans to foreign defaulters could still be made by government owned corporations.

Sen. Hiram Johnson

As it now stands, however, the bill puts in the hands of the administration its most powerful weapon for forcing payment of defaulted war debts. No defaulting nation may float any private loan in this country, and any American aiding in the illegal flotation of a private loan to a defaulter would be liable to five years in jail and $10,000 in fines.

According to Chairman Jesse Jones of the RFC, the President's plan calls for the creation of a trading bank which will partially underwrite extension of credits to foreign purchasers of American goods. The bank would be entirely owned by the government, so the arrangement would actually be a partial government guarantee of payment to the American producer. The bank would be a division of the RFC. The scheme is devised mainly to promote trade with Russia and it is hoped the Soviet republic will take much of our surplus farm and industrial products.

WILLIAM P. M'CRACKEN, who was assistant secretary of commerce for aeronautics in the Hoover administration, and three air line officials got into a jam with the senate committee that is investigating air mail contracts. All four of them were cited to appear before the senate to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt. McCracken practices law in Washington. The others are L. H. Brittin, vice president of Northwest Airways; Harris M. Hanshue, president of Western Air Express, and Gilbert Givvin, Hanshue's secretary. McCracken has been under technical arrest but this was vacated.



W. P. McCracken

Chairman Black's report to the senate showed that Brittin admitted that he had removed from McCracken's office and destroyed subpoenaed correspondence; and also that Givvin, on order from Hanshue, had removed confidential papers since recovered by the committee.

Senator Black also told the senate that testimony before the committee showed post office contracts had been awarded "collusively and fraudulently" and that former Postmaster General Brown and McCracken participated in a "secret meeting" held in a room adjacent to Brown's Post Office department office at which the country was divided into certain mail routes and contracts were distributed among "particular" operating companies.

The chairman declared that Brown was a "heavy stockholder" in the Pennsylvania railroad and other companies interested in aviation, and charged that the practice of distributing contracts "in secret" was a violation of the law.

IN A unanimous opinion the Supreme Court of the United States held that all persons accused of violating the late national prohibition laws and whose cases had not been finally adjudicated by December 5 last, when the Eighteenth amendment was repealed should be set free. The opinion held that repeal canceled the power of prosecution.

According to the Department of Justice, there were 9,576 prohibition cases, with about 13,000 defendants, pending in federal courts.

Harrison Fisher First in Portraying Beauty

The artistry of a French peasant maid who concealed her scantiness of hair with some ribbon was the odd inspiration that caused Harrison Fisher to draw the first of his long series of magazine covers idealizing the beauty of young feminine America. He was known as the "father of a thousand pretty girls," but he never married.

Reared in Brooklyn, schooled at the Mark Hopkins institute in San Francisco, widely traveled in England and on the continent, Fisher knew the girl of the New York drawing room and of the western plains. He was born during the Garfield-Arthur period; he saw the fashionable world in coaches behind teams and in the side saddle; on bicycles, and in linen dusters, goggles and flowing motor veils and then in limousines. He felt the wild pulsation of the Spanish war, and lived through the World war well into an exciting period of readjustment. He knew Victorian England, and the England of Edward and George.

Fisher portrayed rather than interpreted. Thousands of drawings and illustrations that flowed from the point of his pen have been, for an interesting generation, far closer to the American home than the famed treasures hanging in museums abroad.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Remarkable Vessel

On the banks of the Wade river, New Zealand, is being constructed one of the strangest craft ever made to ply the sea. It is the Gospel ship Ysabel, and is built by L. Beavis, who plans to sail it personally. He has measured everything by span of the fingers, and has kept a Bible handy while working, writing or cutting a text from the gospel on every timber of the vessel. The figurehead represents an angel holding an open Bible. The Ysabel is 41 feet long and rigged as a barquentine. The timbers were cut and shaped with an ax, saw and plane and a chisel made out of an old file. Auxiliary power will be supplied by a hand-driven propelling device invented by Beavis.

Writers of "Fairy World"

Through the Centuries, Men of Great Minds Have Depicted Delightfully the Make-Believe Realm So Dear to the Childish Heart.

"You see, Wendy," says Peter Pan, "when the first baby laughed for the first time, the laugh broke into a thousand pieces, and they all went skipping about, and that was the beginning of fairies. And so there ought to be one fairy for every boy and girl. But children know so much now that they don't believe in fairies and every time a child says he doesn't believe in fairies, there is a fairy somewhere that falls down dead." Thus Mr. Barrie, with his quaint touch, approaches fairyland.

If, as is claimed, there are 350 variants of Cinderella, the story must have enlisted the interest of many writers. In the Egyptian tales, Cinderella was called Rhodope; in Serbian, Papelluga; in Scotch, Ashpat; in French, Cendreusette, or Cendrillon; in Russian, Chornushka, and in German, Aschenputtel. Cinderella is also symbolized as the Dawn; her stepmother, as Night; the sisters as Clouds obscuring the brightness of the Sun (the prince) who finds her at last in her glorious robes of sunset.

Many of the great writers have tried a hand at the fairy tale. In "Midsummer Night's Dream," Shakespeare has shown the fairy world in a way that is delightful and charming, in spite of Pepys' ill-natured remark that it was the silliest stuff ever he heard. Titania, the dainty little queen of the fairies, is described as Queen Mab, in "Romeo and Juliet," "in shape no bigger than an agate stone." And Puck is often compared with Ariel, though Hazlitt wondered how Shakespeare could have made two such different characters out of the same fanciful material.

Hawthorne's "Wonder Book" was a favorite with my children, but they did not care for Kingsley's "Water Babies," nor for "Alice in Wonderland" which delights so many children. Ruskin's "King of the Golden River" and McDonald's "At the Back of the North Wind" were recommended at school, but I am not sure that I read them. Miss Mulock's "Little Lame Prince" fascinated me as a child and the Grimm "Fairy Tales" and some of Hans Christian Andersen's stories were read to pieces.

Washington Irving, in the "Alhambra," writes of the three beautiful Princesses Zayda, curious and inquisitive; Zorayda, fond of beauty in any form, flowers, jewels, and her own image in a fountain; Zorahayda, soft, timid, sensitive, tender, loving, and gentle. The "Rose of the Alhambra," beautiful Jacinta, with her magic lute, the enchanted lute that bewitched the world through the genius of Paganini.

The "Rose and the Ring" is a title suggestive of a much happier story than the grotesque tale spun out at length by Thackeray, concerning the fortunes of Giglio, the deposed nephew of Valorosa XXIV, king of Paflagonia. The Fairy Blackstick with the aid of the Rose and the Ring and her fairy wand makes all things come right for the beautiful Rosalba who almost lost her Giglio by the wiles of the governess of Angelica, who as Countess Gruffanuff wanted to marry him herself. I doubt if this "Fireside Pantomime" served by Timothy Titmouse would be appreciated by the children of today.

Perhaps the "Christmas Carol" is not listed as a fairy tale, but it is probably read by thousands in the Christmas season, in order to conjure up the Christmas spirit which transformed Old Scrooge. We have needed much of that good spirit to counteract the influence of Old Man Depression!

They came from beds of lichen green,
They creep from the mullein's velvet screen;
Some on the back of beetles fly
From the silver tops of moon-touched trees.
Where they swung in their cobweb hammocks high,
And rocked about in the evening breeze;
And now they throng the moonlit glade,
Above—below—on every side,
Their little minim forms arrayed,
In the tricksy pomp of fairy pride.

Mind Works Hard in Split Second

Four employees of a large building in New York recently dropped in a defective elevator from the fourteenth floor to the basement. They were fortunate enough to come through alive.

That was an experience worth learning something about. So the newspapers sent reporters to ask these people how it felt to take such a drop, to know you were dropping, and not be able to do anything but wait for the inevitable crash and probable mutilation or death.

"The whole thing seemed to take only a split second," said one of the survivors. "And," he added confidentially, "it was funny, but a lot of things seemed to shoot through my mind!"

We can imagine what those things were that shot through this man's mind in just a split second of time. Perhaps he had left home that morning without kissing his wife good-by. He might have been harsh with his boy. Or perhaps it was the word of appreciation that was well earned but which a perverse impulse prevented his giving that ran through his mind in that split second.

There can be no doubt that his experience in the elevator sent that man home a better husband and father—for a while, anyway. It raised him for a moment, a split moment to be sure, out of the treadmill of daily routine which shuts off our view from all but the road we are trying to "cover." It gave him for that split second perspective and a sense of values, the realization that what counts most in life is what is between us and those we love, and that the most precious moments are those in which we give something of ourselves to their happiness.

Lucky the person who could have that "split second" of revelation—and live to act on it.

An artificial heart has been developed by Moscow surgeons, which, when perfected, is expected to revolutionize methods of operating on the heart. It is a device for pumping the blood through the arteries like a real heart. Sixteen stitches were taken in the heart and then it was put back into the body. The dog has survived.

The Guns of the Holy Trinity

By Henry C. Rowland

According to honest Mike, these unmounted guns evidently had been held in reserve, down on the keel, where they contributed to serve as ballast. When the Fourquet turned turtle they either had crashed through the decks, or smashed through later from their weight, finally to come to rest on a main beam of the spar deck, that was on bottom.

The count de Corlay and Doctor White were both out aboard the diver's yawl when this report was made, and the agitation of the count, though contained in a masterly manner, did not escape the keen observation of the doctor. Not unnaturally, for Mike's English was crude, the count interrogated him in his native Portuguese. But this did not prevent Doctor White from arriving at his own conclusions. He was more and more convinced that the bore of those guns contained something of interest not only to the collector of antiquities but to the collector of cold cash.

"Let's get those guns up and aboard," he said.

Mike shook his head. "Dem t'ing too dam' heavy, sir. S'pose we try lift 'em board, da tackle bust."

"Could you get them up alongside?" Tom asked.

"I guess so, boss. Don' take-a much to h'ist 'em in da water."

"Then go down and rig a chain strop on one of them and we will drift it over to the beach at high water," the doctor advised. "We can handle them from there."

This accordingly was done. But even then Tom, who was bossing the job of hoisting, trembled for his gear. Looking over the side as the gun came nearly awash he was surprised to find it no larger. The yawl must, he thought, be tender for this piece of ordnance, less its specific gravity, to give her such a heel. It was not a very ornate cannon, as were many of its epoch, and it seemed to be covered with some sort of gummy slime rather than the tarnish of verdigris that one might have expected.

The tide was flowing in at this moment, about three-quarters high, and as it was time to knock off for midday dinner they decided to wait until after their meal, then float the cannon over to the beach when it might be examined at leisure later in the day. This program was carried out, accordingly, when Doctor White, although finding it repugnant to suspect a French officer and gentleman for whom he had conceived a sincere liking and respect, still kept a wary eye on the spot where that gun had been deposited.

The two others were handled in like manner, Tom towing the yawl into the little cove behind the battered launch, for the damage to which he had insisted on making full indemnity. Then, when the twelve feet drop of tide had left the pieces of ordnance high and the interested little throng of spectators had departed for their respective suppers, the treasure hunters went over to examine what did not seem to provide any great remuneration for their toil, expense and incidental danger.

There were only the five of the actively interested. Aunt Martha had sniffed at this poor find and returned to the more important detail of supper. Mike had chugged over to town. Doctor White, walking down the hard shingle with the count, stood looking at the guns reflectively.

"Odd that they should be so foul," he observed.

Tom leaned down and scraped at the gummy coating with his knife's edge. It was displaced to show a brassy gleam beneath, at which Tom scratched with the point of the blade, that scarred it very slightly.

"Looks like pure brass," he said, "a little dull for our kind, but about as hard. Wonder what this gummy stuff was for. It isn't sea slime. More like wax, or rubber."

The count cleared his throat. He was pale, and his hand trembled a little on his malacca stick. "For many years," he said truthfully enough, "gunners have had the habit of covering their ordnance with such a preparation when they are not required to keep them polished."

Doctor White tapped the mouth of the gun sharply with the iron tip of his own stick. It gave out a bell note. Then, deliberately, he shoved his cane into the muzzle and along to where it fetched up at the breach, laying off the depth on the outside of the piece. Calmly, he repeated this measuring of the other two. All three were the same, and all three empty.

If this examination suggested anything to the minds of count de Corlay or his son, their expressions gave no hint of it. As for Doctor White, he could have found it in his heart to be glad his inspection had nothing to reveal. It would have pained him to discover that these distinguished Frenchmen were capable of sordid deceit, if such indeed it could have been considered. But not only was the doctor relieved, in a sense he was also puzzled. It seemed to him that he had felt a tension in the air from the moment of Mike's description of these guns, and that this tension had steadily increased.

"Well," said Tom shortly, "at least they're not duds."

The count slowly shook his head. He looked as if suddenly taken ill. "No," he drew a deep breath, "they are not—duds—" his voice trailed off into a sort of attenuated whisper. "They—are—not—duds."

CHAPTER XII

Doctor White shot him a swift glance. He ascribed this apparent faintness to an overpowering disappointment. He was convinced that the count had firmly expected the presence of vast treasure in those guns. Jewels, diamonds and rubies from some bishop's miter, or pearls, from Rio de la Hach. Somebody aboard the corvette had guessed the secret, perhaps, and found time to get below and draw the priceless charges before the hold had filled.

The count drew another deep breath and appeared to get himself in hand. But Doctor White was disturbed by the pallor of his face. Also its expression puzzled him, because it was not that of a man who has suffered crushing disappointment, but of one who struggles to suppress some violently active emotion rather than the passive crushing one of profound chagrin.

The discerning doctor was more than ever certain that count de Corlay had good reason to count on a secret hoard contained in these guns, and that even though they had proven to be empty of such, this might yet be found in others. But having now seen that Doctor White suspected something of this sort, the count was torn between eager expectation of treasure still secreted in such a fashion and despair at knowing that he might as well abandon all hope of its possession.

Doctor White glanced at Robert. That young man's face wore a mask-like indifference. He did not seem to be concerned at all about their comparatively worthless find, but what struck the doctor as even more singular in so evidently devoted a son, he did not appear to observe the obvious distress of his father.

Then, catching the doctor's eye Robert said lightly, "Well, it rather looks as if papa and I had been had."

"Had by whom?" Doctor White demanded.

"By our jolly old revered ancestor. I don't mind telling you now that he recorded a tidy bit of personal plunder in the diary we found. But some artful johnny must have piped it down and scoffed it in the shuffle."

"We might find it yet," said Tom. "I'm going down to have a look-see myself when Mike gets through. He may have missed something."

Doctor White nodded. "Of course I don't know what was recorded in the diary, but it seems to me too early in the game to give up hope. I think also that it would be very much better if you were to tell us just what was in the diary."

Robert smiled. "What's the good of that, sir, when you have shown us very clearly that we have actually no legal claim at all? I don't mind telling you frankly that it would only be a slap at our ancestor and the family name. Your suspicions that he might have collared something to the whole of which he was not entitled, were entirely correct."

"Robert," said the count sharply, "you say too much—"

"What's the odds, papa? The jig's up. The diver has overhauled the cabin and drawn a blank. I would jump at the chance of selling out our share—if the doctor considers we're entitled to any—for what we've taken off her already. These little guns don't look like much, but the plate would be rather nice to have."

"We have already decided among ourselves that you were to have the plate," said Doctor White, "and you are quite welcome to the guns, too, for that matter. But we don't insist on your abandoning all further share."

The count and Robert exchanged a swift, startled look. Then Robert asked, slowly, "Just what is your estimate of our proper share, Doctor White?"

"Gentlemen," said Doctor White, "my ward, Miss Poole, and I decided before starting our salvage operations that the value of whatever we might secure should in all fairness be divided in three equal shares, one third to the De Corlays, who sped our efforts, and because Robert helped drive off Sebastien, one-third to Tom Jordan for similar reasons, and one-third to Miss Poole and myself because we were the first to establish an actual claim by getting a line to the wreck. Miss Poole and I would not have beaten Sebastien but for what you gentlemen told us. We were actually trying to beat you. We could not then have held our claim if it had not been for Tom and Robert, particularly Tom. And if it had not been for us, principally Miss Poole, Sebastien would certainly have got his line fast to the Fourquet before Tom and Robert arrived on the scene. I think that you must all admit the justice of these statements, and their truth."

Although tortoises are noted for their long lives, a well known expert on reptiles is of the opinion that crocodiles probably are the longest-lived creatures on earth.

Right Plates or Dishes for Soup

Fashion's Decrees Will Be Observed by Wise Hostess.

With the return to style of soup plates it is important for the homemaker to be acquainted with the different kinds of soups best suited to being served in them, and in bouillon cups, also called soup cups. The very name, bouillon, indicates the kind of soup originaly intended to be served in these cups. The word is French for a clear soup or a beef broth. Fashion decreed for some time that all varieties of soup should be served in these bouillon cups, but now there is a return to the more proper method, of suiting the soup to the dishes.

The chief distinction in suitability of soups to serve in cups or in plates is their density. Clear soups, even though they may not be strained as is bouillon or consomme, but have some solid pieces of ingredients in them, are the sort to be served in cups. Cream soups and heavy soups such as chowders, oyster and other stew soups, etc., should be served in soup plates. When soup is in cups, there is the inference that they may be sipped as well as taken with spoons. Heavy soups cannot be so sipped, and there should be no hint in the way it is served that such an inconsistency is considered.

Serving thin soup in plates is not a faux pas. The first return of style in serving such soup in plates was when glass soup plates appeared. Clear soup showed off the beauty of the glass most advantageously, and was served in it. Therefore the young homemaker need not have both cups and soup plates, but may, with propriety, use soup plates for all soups. The same cannot be said any longer of bouillon cups.

Clear soups must be of sufficient strength to make the watery liquid full flavored. Meat is the recognized essence to be imparted. Chicken, lamb, and beef broth are delicate and delicious when properly made. The fresh meat, of whichever kind, is covered with water brought to a boil and then allowed to simmer until the water has become rich in flavor from the meat juices. Salt and pepper are the condiments to use. If an onion is cooked in the water, no particles should remain in the soup when served. Also all fat should be skimmed off.

Consomme can be made from a combination of meats such as chicken and a ham bone, knuckle of veal and beef soup meat, etc. With the meat are boiled and simmered vegetables, such as celery, carrots, turnip; and the condiments of salt and pepper may be augmented with a very little mace and cloves, one blade of mace or one-eighth teaspoonful and four to six cloves are sufficient for four pounds of the combined meats and four quarts of cold water. Consomme is strained and may be clarified by straining through a cloth.

Why the Sudden Change to Liquid Laxatives?

Doctors have always recognized the value of the laxative whose dose can be measured, and whose action can be thus regulated to suit individual need.

The public, too, is fast returning to the use of liquid laxatives. People have learned that a properly prepared liquid laxative brings a perfect movement without any discomfort at the time, or after.

The dose of a liquid laxative can be varied to suit the needs of the individual. The action can thus be regulated. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will a mild liquid laxative irritate the kidneys.

The wrong cathartic may often do more harm than good.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a prescription, and is perfectly safe. Its laxative action is based on senna—a natural laxative. The bowels will not become dependent on this form of help. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is at all druggists. Member N. R. A.

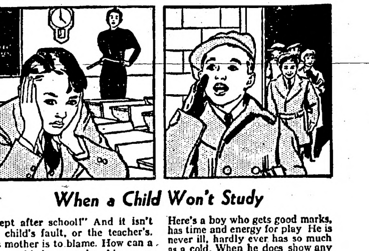
Whose Fault?



When a Child Won't Study

"Kept after school!" And it isn't the child's fault, or the teacher's. His mother is to blame. How can a boy get his lessons when his senses are dulled day after day by dosing with sickening purgatives? When a child's bowels are stagnant they need help, of course. But not some drastic drug to upset the stomach, perhaps weaken the entire system; or form the laxative habit. On the right, parents will find a happy solution of this problem:

Here's a boy who gets good marks, has time and energy for play. He is never ill, hardly ever has so much as a cold. When he does show any symptoms of being sluggish, his mother knows just what to do. She gives him a little California Syrup of Figs—and that is all. It's a natural, fruity laxative that is agreeable to take, and its gentle laxative action comes from senna. Parents are urged to use just pure California Syrup of Figs. Be sure bottle says 'California'.

IN MEMORIAM

In fond and loving memory of our dear wife and mother, Mrs. Arno Steinhauer, who passed to a land unknown one year ago, February 24, 1933.

One year has passed,
Our hearts still sore,
As time rolls on we miss her more,
Her ready smile, her loving face,
None can ever fill her place.

When evening shadows are falling,
When with our thoughts we are alone,
To our hearts there comes a longing,
Oh! if she only could come home.

No one knows the silent heartache,
Only those who have lost can tell,
Its the grief that is borne in silence
For the one we loved so well.

In peace we leave her,
In the quiet and rest,
Though the parting was painful,
God knows best.

Arno Steinhauer and children,
Irene and Adulph.

To Conduct Finance Study

Arrangements have been completed by the state highway department for a Federal financial survey of state, county, township and municipal roads throughout Minnesota, N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner, announced today.

The study will be carried out by the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads. It will be directed by Professor Henry R. Trumbower, professor of economics at the University of Wisconsin and economist for the Bureau of Roads. H. R. Briggs, statistician for the Bureau of Roads will be in direct charge of the work which will start at once.

Primary aims of the survey, Mr. Elsberg said, are:

To analyze all highway expenditures and revenues of the state of the counties and of townships and municipalities.

2. To show the total revenues raised for other governmental units in comparison with revenues raised for highways, bridges and streets.

3. To show the effect of highway and related taxes on property of all kinds.

The survey will also show the cost per mile of maintaining and improving the various classes of roads under jurisdiction of different governmental units. Comparisons will be made with other states, for the U. S. Bureau of Roads has made similar studies in Wisconsin, Michigan and elsewhere.

The Highway department and the Bureau of Roads, Mr. Elsbreg said, also expect to conduct a traffic census which will show the origin and destination of traffic on highways, as well as the volume of traffic.

"Facts developed by these studies", Mr. Elsberg said, "should be of great value to the state in solving problems of high way development and highway taxation. The results of the survey will be made available to the Citizens Interim Highway committee recently named by Governor Olson."

This committee is to make a study of Minnesota highway problems and report to the next legislature.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

I have received inquiries in regard to the number of accidents on the highways for 1933.

Preliminary reports thus far show that there is an increase in 1933 over 1932 in the number of accidental deaths by motor vehicles.

Approximately 30,500 people have been killed on the highways last year. In spite of fewer cars on the streets and lower gasoline consumption, there were 3.4 per cent more vehicle accidents in 1933 than in 1932. Accident prevention, however, has been able to hold down this figure because in some of the states such as Wisconsin, Michigan and Virginia, decreases have been reported in certain sections of those states. This is gratifying.

If it were only possible to enroll all of the people in a concientious safety movement, these accidents could be eliminated entirely.

It can be done, but we must all help.

Where the Tall Corn Grows

IOWA may be the only state that has a song written to her "tall corn" but we must admit that some pretty good corn grows in other places. Golden Bantam, Country Gentleman and other varieties that make a vegetable garden such a "toothsome" thing in summer are favorites all over the country.

Corn in Mid-Winter

It is a good thing for us that we are not limited to a short summer season for our enjoyment of this delicious and nourishing vegetable, and that we can have it, fresh and succulent in mid-winter just as easily as on those hot days in summer when the farmers say that you can "hear the corn growing." In the off-season of growing corn your grocer is your source of supply and your own larder your storage place.

Here are some suggestions for using corn, from the cob or canned—which have been tried and found good.

Corn Fritters: Beat an egg well and add to the contents of one 8-ounce can of corn, or one large cup of corn cut from the cob. Mix together one-half cup flour, one teaspoon baking powder and one-fourth teaspoon salt. Add to the corn. Drop by spoonfuls into hot drip fat, 375 degrees, and fry until brown.

Corn and Sweet Potato Scallop: Make a white sauce of two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour, one and one-half cups milk and salt and pepper. Put alternate layers of whole kernel corn from a No. 1 can, and dried cooked sweet potatoes (two cups of them) in a buttered baking dish and pour sauce over. Top with buttered crumbs and bake in a hot oven from fifteen to twenty minutes. Serves six.*

The Bank of England is permitted to brew beer for public sale without license, or it might turn to pawnbroking, which the terms of the charter are wide enough to cover.

Bloody Riots in Paris Drive Out Daladier, and Doumergue Becomes Premier—Devaluation of Dollar Brings Flood of Gold.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

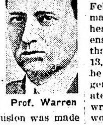
Gaston Doumergue

FRANCE seemingly narrowly escaped a civil war. Following two days of bloody rioting in Paris and other cities, Premier Daladier and his cabinet capitulated and the reins of government were put in the hands of Gaston Doumergue, the seventy-one-year-old former president who was in retirement on his country estate. His reappearance on the political stage was in response to the pleadings of President Lebrun and many other patriots who were convinced that he alone could restore the country to quiet. It was conditioned on pledges that both chambers of parliament would support him unreservedly and that the president would give him an executive order dissolving the parliament and calling new elections, to be used if he considered it necessary. So the "iron man" of France, as he has been dubbed, returned to Paris with plans for a small cabinet made up of former premiers and party leaders and with power to make himself the virtual dictator of the country.

War veterans, Monarchists, Communists and other elements joined in the violent demonstrations that forced out the Daladier regime. All joined in opposition to the government, though no one of the groups was in accord with any others in other respects. The mobs were furious and fought desperately with the police and the troops that Daladier had brought into the capital. The rioters, operating mainly in the Place de la Concorde and the region about the Palais Bourbon where the chamber of deputies sits, were raked by machine gun fire, sabered by mounted troops and clubbed and shot by the infantry and police. But they returned to the fray time after time and would not cease the struggle until Daladier resigned. The number of dead was estimated at fifty, and more than a thousand persons were wounded. After the battles were over the boulevards in the center of Paris presented a scene of desolation and destruction unequaled there since days of the commune in 1871.

Nationalist elements resented especially the removal by Daladier of Jean Chiappe as prefect of police, feeling that he was being made a scapegoat in the Bayonne bond scandal. The Communists and Socialists accused Chiappe of fomenting the rioting, but the "right" element said the "leftists" were determined to get the Corsican out of the way because they knew he would block the proletarian coup d'etat they were planning. The Royalists were in the mix-up hopeful, as always, that they might be able to restore the monarchy and put on the throne the duc de Guise, head of the Bourbon house of Orleans, who lives in exile in Brussels. Naturally the pretender shares in that hope, but he was quoted as deploring the bloodshed.

DEVALUATION of the dollar, and the purchase of gold at $35 a fine ounce caused a turmoil in the world's money markets and an immediate result was a great flow of gold bullion from Europe to the United States. The pound sterling and the franc made gains, but not big enough to suit President Roosevelt and his monetary advisers. Later both the pound and franc declined again, and the confusion was made greater. The French were alarmed by the drain on their gold and expressed intense resentment against the American policy, charging that the administration was making deliberate efforts to embarrass France.



Prof. Warren

For the time being the administration was prevented from driving the dollar down to its projected parity points in foreign exchanges by the rising tide of American dollars flowing back to this country. But most of its financial experts were confident that the 59.06 cents value would be made to prevail after a reasonable time to allow for the shakedown. As for the $35 an ounce for gold, it is the opinion of Prof. George F. Warren, chief deviser of the experiment that is under way, that the figure must be raised if prices of commodities are to be put up materially. Frank E. Gannett, the Rochester newspaper publisher, after a visit to the White House and talking with both the President and Professor Warren, said in his Rochester Times-Union that he had been convinced by those conversations "that we shall continue to raise the price of gold" and that the $35 figure probably would succeed only in preventing prices from slipping.

By the President's devaluation stroke a treasury deficit of $1,900,000,000 was transformed overnight into a surplus of $973,716,937.

IT WAS authoritatively stated in Washington that the President believes that excessive interest rates on all classes of debts should be reduced as an important step toward reduction of the debt structure. His viewpoint applies to foreign debts owed to United States citizens, to private debts and to those of industry. He was said to be of the opinion that reduction of interest would make payment more probable, and that fixed charges also could be cut down.

Bills before the senate, which have house approval already, would enable corporations and municipalities or other political subdivisions of states to scale down the principal and interest of their debts through an agreement with the majority of their creditors.

Legislation is already in effect which enables the individual to rearrange his debt and interest rates through a pact with the majority of those he owes and to give similar help to railroads. There have been complaints that these laws have not been particularly effective and that they need strengthening.

The President, in letting it be known that he thought the debtor was paying too much on obligations contracted in better times, did not say what he believed was a fair rate nor did he specify particular charges that he regarded as too high.

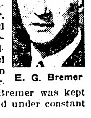
NRA and the steel industry came into sharp conflict, and the NRA to a certain extent backed down. Executives of all the leading steel companies met and considered the claim of the national labor board to authority given by the President to conduct elections for employee representatives when a "substantial" number request that action. To this the steel men took exception. They issued a statement saying the industry intends "to resist all attacks" upon company unions and that it holds that the present plan of employee representation complies with the NRA. The statement, however, declared the steel industry "is cooperating whole-heartedly with the President in his efforts for national recovery and subscribes fully to the principle of collective bargaining as provided in section 7 (a) of the national recovery act."

Gen. Johnson.

The NRA had given out a press statement implying that all company unions are dominated by employers. This drew sharp criticism, and the statement was retracted. Administrator Johnson and NRA Counsel Donald Richberg upheld the right of the labor board as stated above. They asserted, however, that the executive order which said that representatives elected by a majority of workers "have been thereby designated to represent all the employees," does not abridge the rights of labor minorities to conduct negotiations with employers.

SAMUEL INSULL, who was due to be ousted from Greece on February 1, was permitted to remain for a time because of ill health, but the government at Athens then informed him unofficially that he must leave before February 13, two physicians having reported he was able to travel without danger to his life. The fugitive immediately began packing up, but at this writing it was not known where he would go in his effort to avoid extradition.

TWENTY-TWO days after he was kidnaped, Edward G. Bremer, banker of St. Paul, Minn., was set free in Rochester, Minn., and made his way home, nervous and with wounds on his head inflicted when he was "snatched," but otherwise unharmed. His father, Adolf Bremer, wealthy brewer, had paid the $200,000 demanded by the kidnapers, in $10 and $5 bills, through an intermediary. During his captivity Bremer was kept in a dark room and under constant guard.



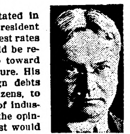
E. G. Bremer

State and federal law enforcement agencies were conducting an intensive hunt for the abductors of Bremer, who probably numbered ten or more. It was believed the victim was held in either Sioux City or Kansas City.

Verne Sankey, notorious kidnaper who was captured recently in Chicago and taken to Sioux Falls, S. D., for safe keeping until his trial in a federal court, committed suicide in his cell by hanging, using a loop made of neckties. He had admitted the abduction of Charles Boettcher of Denver and Haskell Bohn of St. Paul.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT called congressional leaders into conference and with them formulated bills designed to bring the stock markets of the country under federal control. The measures were then introduced in both house and senate. They deal with short selling, marginal trading, specialists, pool operations and manipulation.

WITH little debate the senate passed the bill introduced by Senator Hiram Johnson of California which is designed to prevent the floating in America of private loans to countries now defaulting on past debts. Before passing it, the senators amended the measure so it would not hamper the President's new scheme to grant to foreign nations loans with which to buy American goods. A proviso was written in declaring that loans to foreign defaulters could still be made by government owned corporations.



Sen. Hiram Johnson

As it now stands, however, the bill puts in the hands of the administration its most powerful weapon for forcing payment of defaulted war debts. No defaulting nation may float any private loan in this country, and any American aiding in the illegal flotation of a private loan to a defaulter would be liable to five years in jail and $10,000 in fines.

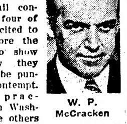
According to Chairman Jesse Jones of the RFC, the President's plan calls for the creation of a trading bank which will partially underwrite extension of credits to foreign purchasers of American goods. The bank would be entirely owned by the government, so the arrangement would actually be a partial government guarantee of payment to the American producer. The bank would be a division of the RFC.

ONLY one representative voted "no" when the house of representatives passed on the bill to appropriate $950,000,000 for continuation of CWA and direct relief activities. The lone opponent was Representative George B. Terrill of Texas, Democrat. The money is to be used by the federal emergency relief administration for keeping up the federal dole to the idle for another year and for continuing the Civil Works administration until the early part of May. About 500 millions is to be used for the former purpose, it was said, and about 450 for the Civil Works administration.

BACKED by the President, a federal grand jury investigation was going on in Washington that promised to uncover a $10,000,000 scandal in the War department. Two lawyers prominently connected in the past with the American Legion were said to be involved. It was asserted that automobile manufacturers had been asked for a fee of $50,000 in return for War department contracts for trucks running into millions.

The house naval committee made an inquiry into airplane and engine contracts that, it was predicted, would lead to changes in the Navy department's system of audits.

WILLIAM P. M'CRACKEN, who was assistant secretary of commerce for aeronautics in the Hoover administration, and three air line officials got into a jam with the senate committee that is investigating air mail contracts. All four of them were cited to appear before the senate to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt. McCracken practices law in Washington. The others are L. H. Brittin, vice president of Northwest Airways; Harris M. Hanshue, president of Western Air Express, and Gilbert Givvin, Hanshue's secretary. McCracken has been under technical arrest but this was vacated.



W. P. McCracken

Chairman Black's report to the senate showed that Brittin admitted that he had removed from McCracken's office and destroyed subpoenaed correspondence; and also that Givvin, on order from Hanshue, had removed confidential papers since recovered by the committee.

Senator Black also told the senate that testimony before the committee showed post office contracts had been awarded "collusively and fraudulently" and that former Postmaster General Brown and McCracken had participated in a "secret meeting" held in a room adjacent to Brown's Post Office department office at which the country was divided into certain mail routes and contracts were distributed among "particular" operating companies.

Minnesota Land Bank Loans Total $7,376,000 For Month of January

Minnesota farmers numbering 2,824 borrowed $7,376,000 from the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul in January just closed, and checks were sent out for that amount, it is disclosed in figures released by the Land Bank. Only once before in the history of the bank have Minnesota farmers been granted as large a volume of loans in any one month, December, 1933.

The total loans for January, however, made a new record for the Seventh District, exceeding the previous December record, the respective figures being $18,354,000 and $18,242,000. The January number of farmers who were granted loans also set a new monthly record, being 8,366 compared with 7,883, for the previous record month of December.

Commissioner's loans in Minnesota for the month exceeded the number of regular land bank loans, the respective figures being 1,440 and 1,384, a situation that was paralleled in Wisconsin and in Michigan. North Dakota for the month had a greater number of Land Bank loans than of commissioner's loans.

The volume of credit extended under the commissioner's loans in this state was $2,260,000 approximately, compared with $5,115,000 in land bank loans.

For the whole district, the number of farmers who got "Commissioner's loans" exceeded the number receiving regular Land Bank loans, being respectively, 4,282 and 4,084. This is held to confirm the view frequently expressed by persons connected with the Federal Land Bank, namely that the Commissioner's loan is enabling the Federal Land Bank to be of service to thousands of farmers who could not, under present conditions, qualify for a Land Bank loan.

Divided as to volume, the Land Bank loans, however, exceed those made from the Commissioner's fund, the Land Bank loans totaling $12,827,000 as against $5,785,000 from the Commissioner's fund.

The Biggest Little Paper In Marshall County

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

H.O. Hanson, Editor and Publisher | Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota, Friday, March 2, 1934. | Volume 22, Number 44

No Annual Report Published

We were all set to publish the annual report of the Farmers Cooperative Creamery this week but, due to the fact that some farmer had razzed the board of directors about the expense of running the creamery, the board deemed it best to cut this small amount out that it would cost the patrons to have the report published.

This will be the first time in eight years since we took over the local paper that the report has not been printed. We are not mentioning this fact to in any way take a crack at the local board of directors as they are trying their best to cooperate with and satisfy all the patrons.

Here is the way we see it: By taking the number of patrons as listed in the annual report and dividing the cost of publishing the report by that number of patrons, we find that the cost is only five and a half cents per patron. This is putting it out at a reasonable figure.

But that's not all. And we would like to tell any would-be-howlers that this cost of five and a half cents is all that some of the creamery patrons contribute in a year towards keeping a newspaper in the commuaity. But, nevertheless, some of these same people that are first to find fault, often ask the publisher to help promote anything that may look like it would benefit them. They seem to know the value of an item in print and more so it it is done free.

Regardless of these facts we are going to to stand by the board of directors of the local creamery and will help them to boost for the institution and to promote projects that may be of any value to the people of this community.

Swan Carlson Passed Away

Swan Carlson a pioneer farmer of this community passed away at the hospital in Warren on Tuesday last week. Mr. Carlson who was 70 years old, has for the past year made his home with J. A. Sorum, where the county has paid for his board and room.

He came here in 1908 and homesteaded a quarter section in East Valley on the west shore of Mud Lake. There he made his home until about six years ago when he quit farming.

Mrs. Carlson died in June, 1926.

Mr. Carlson has been failing in health the past year and last week was taken very ill and was rushed to the hospital at Warren on Monday and passed away Tuesday evening. Funeral was held at Warren on Friday.

Governor Olson Filed Monday

Governor Olson definitely put his foot down on Monday on all efforts of factions of his party to draft him for United States senator and filed for re-election to a third term as governor.

His action, it was learned at the Capitol, followed a new "draft Olson" movement widely spread throughout the state by Commissioner R. A. Trovatten, commissioner of agriculture, and his employes and friends. The Trovatten movement, Farmer-Labor officials said, had as its aim the nomination of Governor Olson for United States senator, thus leaving the way open for Trovatten himself to run for governor.

The governor filed after he had been informed that large numbers of delegates to the Farmer-Labor state convention had already been solicited and pledged to draft him as the primary opponent of his party against Senator Shipstead, who has fallen into ill favor with a large faction of Farmer-Laborites.

In his filing with Secretary of State Mike Holm, Governor Olson, the admitted head of his party, made a statement definitely declaring that he "will not be drafted" for the Senate race. His declaration was considered as finally and conclusively "spiking" efforts of all the various groups which sought to have him run for the Senate. It does not assure Senator Shipstead of his party convention's indorsement, however, as either Congressman Ernest Lundeen or F. H. Shoemaker may be indorsed. Shoemaker has said he would run against Shipstead if Olson refused to run.

Olson feels that he should be allowed another term to finish many tasks undertaken during his administration.

$30,000 In Gas Tax

Warrants totaling $1,783,500, representing the counties' one-third share of the state gas tax receipts for the last six months of 1933, have been sent out to the 87 counties' treasurers by State Auditor Stafford King.

Marshall county received as its share $30,000.

The payment brings to a total of $3,600,000 the share of the counties in the tax, $1,817,500 having been distributed for the first half receipts.

The 1934 allotment will soon be made to each county on the basis of the number of miles of roads needed or the extent of improvements to county aid roads.

Keep Your High Quality

One of the best paying investments in the dairy is the high quality of your milk. Just that little extra care that you bestow upon the milk is a real asset.

Care bestowed upon the individual cow in a clean and sanitary dairy barn, and on the milk for market, are real assets. You will find that the test and the general returns will more than give you an added profit.

HOLT, MINNESOTA.

Marshall County Organized For Corn-Hog Program

Following an organization meeting at which F. A. Green of Stephen was elected chairman, the temporay campaign committee appointed by Dr. Andrew Boss, Director of Production Control work in the State of Minnesota, divided Marshall county into eight districts and appointed temporary committees to direct the Corn-Hog program in their various districts.

A meeting explaining the Corn-Hog program will be held in Holt on Saturday, March 3 at 1:30 p. m.

Holt District consists of the following townships: Valley, Eckvoll, Mud Loke, Espelie, East Valley, Holt, Excell, Agdar Grand Plain, and Moylan. The Community committee are: H. M. Halvorson chairman, Christ Nelson, Otto Johnson, Robert Bennett, ane one more to be appointed.

Letters have been sent out to every farmer listed on the personal property tax list as having had hogs on hand on March 1, 1933, informing them of educational meetings which are being held throughout Marshall County this week. The purpose of these meetings are to inform anyone at all interested on questions relative to the Corn-Hog plan. Instruction is also being given as to the filling out of various forms which must be complete before the signing of the contract. Particular stress is based on the absolute necessity of securing supporting evidence.

Anyone unable to attend this Meeting may get blanks and information from Emergency Ag. Agent at Warren.

The Corn-Hog Program

According to the new administrative ruling, many more farmers of Marshall County will have the opportunity to sign the Corn-Hog contract, for the requirement has been dropped so that any farmer who has produced an average of one litter during the years of 1932 and 1933 is now eligible to sign the contract.

Because a large number of people do not understand the operation of the Corn-Hog plan, it is the purpose of this article to explain as briefly as possible the workings of the program. The contract calls for not less than a 20 percent reduction in the acreage of land planted to corn below the average annual acreage planted to corn in 1932 and 1933. The producer may retire from corn production all of his average for the past two years, but will only be paid for all reduction up to 30 percent. Anyone who has ten acres or more of mature corn will be required to sign a contract. Corn cut for silage and corn cut green are exempt and anyone whose acreage of corn cut when mature is less than 10 acres is not required to sign a contract.

The contract also calls for 25 percent reduction of litters in 1934 below the average number of litters owned by the producer when farrowed in 1932 and 1933, and also calls for a 25 percent reduction in the number of hogs produced for market from the 1934 litters below the average number of hogs produced for market in 1932 and 1933.

The producer further agrees that he will not increase in 1934 above 1932 or 1933, whichever is the higher, (a) the total number of acres planted for harvest less the contract acres; (b) the acreage planted to each crop for sale designated as a basic commodity (c) the number of any kind of livestock or product thereof other than hogs designated as a basic commodity and kept on the farm for sale; (d) not to increase the total acreage of feed crop and not to increase the number of feeder pigs bought for sale in 1934 over the average number in 1932 anb 1933.

These provisions, together with a few other clauses, are what forms the Corn-Hog contract. It is an entirely voluntary proposition, so designed as to benefit the Corn-Hog industry. The benefits for the above reduction are as follows:

•Corn Reduction: For each contracted acre, the Secretary of Agriculture will pay 30 cents per bushel on the adjusted estimated yield of corn on such contracted land. In other words, should the committee decide that an acre of contracted land would produce 22 bushels of corn the Secretary of Agriculture would pay as rent for such land 30 cents per bushel on 22 bushels or $6.60 per acre less expenses. If the estimated yield was either more or less the rent would vary according to such estimate.

Hog Reduction: In consideration for reducing the number of hogs produced for market from 1934 litters by 25 per cent of the average number produced for market from the 1932 and 1933 litters, the Secretary of Agriculture agrees to pay $5.00 per head less expenses on 75 per cent of the average number of hogs marketed from the 1932—1933 litters.

Anyone desiring more information should communicate with the Emergency Agricultural Agents office at Warren, Minn.

Demobilizing CWA Set Up

Preference lists prepared and two committees named, one a mediation board to hear workers cases, the state CWA and emergency relief committee now has the machinery set up for the eventual tapering off of CWA activities in Minnesota under the federal plan for gradual demobilization of the vast CWA army throughout the nation.

The first committee, one of which will be set up in each county, is composed of: the certifiying officer, the county manager of the national re-employment office, the county relief or other welfare worker, and the county CWA engineer.

This committee will prepare lists of those to be dropped, and will consider them at a regular meeting of the committee, notifying each discharged worker in writing and informing him of his right to appeal to the mediation board.

A mediation board, having the same personnel, will be established in each county, to which a dropped worker may appeal in writing. If dissatisfied with the written report given him, he may appear in person and is even given the right of taking his case to the state CWA committee.

Preference lists, just compiled, would make qualified veterans with dependent the last to be removed from CWA rolls. Major preference, however, always will be given qualified unemployed heads of families with the largest number of dependents.

Second in preference will be citizens of the United States or aliens who have expressed their intention of becoming citizens and who are residents of the county in which they are employed in CWA work; third would be the same class of workers, who, although residents of the state, are not residents of the county where they are at work.

Judge Olson Named Justice

Judge Julius J. Olson of Warren was named on Tuesday by Governor Floyd B. Olson as an associate justice of the state Supreme Court to succeed the late Justice Homer B. Dibell of Duluth.

Governor Olson has considered many possible selections for the place since the death of Justice Dibell February 17. but the name of Judge Olson entered into the picture several days ago, and, after eliminating several names from the head-of-the-lakes region, Governor Olson decided on the jurist from Marshall county.

Judge Olson will close up his affairs on the district bench at once, resigning to take effect Saturday, and will take charge of his new office next Monday.

Olson must run for election this year as the appointment only holds until after the next general election.

In November 1930, upon the death of Judge Grindeland, Gov. Christianson appointed Judge Olson to suceed him, and in 1932 he was elected in the 14th judicial district for a full six year term. His place on the district bench also has to be filled by appointment.

Mr. and Mrs F. K. Fredrickson and Rev. Redal visited at the C. L. Sandberg home last Thursday evening.

Bloody Riots in Paris Drive Out Daladier, and Doumergue Becomes Premier—Austrian Government and Socialists at War.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

FRANCE seemingly narrowly escaped a civil war. Following two days of bloody rioting in Paris and other cities, Premier Daladier and his cabinet capitulated and the reins of government were put in the hands of Gaston Doumergue, the seventy-one-year-old former President who was in retirement on his country estate. His reappearance on the political stage was in response to the pleadings of President Lebrun and many other patriots who were convinced that he alone could restore the country to quiet. It was conditioned on pledges that both chambers of parliament would support him unreservedly and that the president would give him an executive order dissolving the parliament and calling new elections, to be used if he considered it necessary. So the "iron man" of France, as he has been dubbed, returned to Paris with plans for a small cabinet made up of former premiers and party leaders and with power to make himself the virtual dictator of the country.

Gaston Doumergue

War veterans, Monarchists, Communists and other elements joined in the violent demonstrations that forced out the Daladier regime. All joined in opposition to the government, though no one of the groups was in accord with any others in other respects. The mobs were furious and fought desperately with the police and the troops that Daladier had brought into the capital. The rioters, operating mainly in the Place de la Concorde and the region about the Palais Bourbon where the chamber of deputies sits, were raked by machine gun fire, sabered by mounted troops and clubbed and shot by the infantry and police. But they returned to the fray time after time and would not cease the struggle until Daladier resigned. The number of dead was estimated at fifty, and more than a thousand persons were wounded. After the battles were over the boulevards in the center of Paris presented a scene of desolation and destruction unequaled there since days of the commune in 1871.

Organized labor of France, to show its disapproval of what it considered the Fascist methods of the new government, staged a one-day strike that involved one million workers. Virtually every industry was shut down and communication with the outside world was interrupted. Thirty-five thousand troops were on duty in Paris but were unable to prevent riots and the looting of shops by the Communists. Throughout the nation the armed forces were held ready to suppress disorders.

DOWNRIGHT warfare between Socialists of Austria and the government broke out following the proclamation of a general strike and a conflict between Socialists and the police in Linz, capital of Upper Austria. In the melee the police, reinforced by troops, used machine guns and their opponents hurled hand-grenades, with the result that scores of persons were killed. Martial law was declared in Linz and Vienna and civilians caught with weapons were ordered shot at once. Later the troops at Linz opened fire with artillery on Socialists barricaded on the banks of the Danube.

Maj. Emil Fey

First to respond to the strike call in Vienna were the municipal gas plant workers; electric plant employees followed, and the street car service was paralyzed. Chancellor Dollfuss and his cabinet were attending a special service in St. Stephen's cathedral commemorating the anniversary of the coronation of Pope Pius XI, and in the midst of the ceremony the lights went out.

The government issued orders for all troops in the Vienna district to stand ready for immediate action. Fascist heimwehr (home guards) troops, equipped with machine guns, moved out of Vienna toward the thickly populated factory districts.

Meanwhile, emergency works organizations, trained to man the electric and other public service plants, were called out for duty.

The cabinet went into permanent session and decreed the dissolution of the Socialist party. This was the signal for attack on the Socialists by the Fascist heimwehr led by Prince von Starhemberg, and for desperate resistance by the Socialist Schutzbund, which was well armed. Barricades and barbed wire entanglements were placed in the streets and the government troops went into action, with bloody results.

The row with the Socialists came to a head when Maj. Emil Fey, vice chancellor and director of public security, deprived Karl Seitz, Socialist burgomaster of Vienna, of all his police powers. These powers were assumed immediately by Eugene Seydel, chief of police, who is directly responsible to Major Fey. They include public order, police control and authority over press clubs and societies, the regulation of foreigners and expulsions, transportation, theaters, and public amusements.

The situation in Austria was fraught with international peril. For the time being the German Nazis were awaiting results, but it was admitted that if the Dollfuss government could not suppress the revolt Italy and Hungary would have an excuse to intervene; then Germany and the nations of the little entente might be drawn into the affair.

TWENTY-TWO days after he was kidnaped, Edward G. Bremer, banker of St. Paul, Minn., was set free in Rochester, Minn., and made his way home, nervous and with wounds on his head inflicted when he was "snatched," but otherwise unharmed. His father, Adolf Bremer, wealthy brewer, had paid the $200,000 demanded by the kidnapers, in $10 and $5 bills, through an intermediary. During his captivity Bremer was kept in a dark room and under constant guard.

E. G. Bremer

State and federal law enforcement agencies were conducting an intensive hunt for the abductors of Bremer, who probably numbered ten or more. It was believed the victim was held in either Sioux City or Kansas City.

Verne Sankey, notorious kidnaper who was captured recently in Chicago and taken to Sioux Falls, S. D., for safe keeping until his trial in a federal court, committed suicide in his cell by hanging, using a loop made of neckties. He had admitted the abduction of Charles Boettcher of Denver and Haskell Bohn of St. Paul.

ON THE ground that fraud and collusion had been uncovered, Postmaster General Farley canceled the contracts of all air lines carrying the United States air mail, and the President directed the army air service to carry the air mails until further notice. Despite the warm protests of heads of the air line companies and of Colonel Lindbergh against this summary action, it appeared likely the transfer of the service to the army would be made permanent.

The country was divided into three areas, eastern, central and western, for this service. Operations in the eastern area will be carried on from the Newark (N. J.) airport under Maj. B. O. Jones of Langley Field, Va. Lieut. Col. H. C. Hickam of Fort Crockett, Galveston, Texas, will be in charge of operations in the central area, with headquarters in Chicago. Lieut. Col. H. H. Arnold will command the western area. The change was ordered in effect on February 19.

Air mail letters will move more slowly and will be flown to fewer places in the first weeks that the army tries to fill the shoes of a highly developed private industry, post office officials admitted. Service will be curtailed and less speedy while army bombers lumber over the routes previously skimmed by fast private mail planes.

Major transcontinental routes will be flown at once by the army, Harlee Branch, second assistant postmaster general in charge of air mail, said. Secondary lines will be disregarded for the time being, Mr. Branch said, but gradually they will be picked up again as organization of the army-post office service is perfected. Eventually, Mr. Branch indicated, the Post Office department looks forward to the full re-establishment of air mail services as they now exist under private companies.

MEANWHILE the senate committee investigating air mail contracts was playing a most undignified game of tag with William P. MacCracken, whose arrest on contempt charges had been ordered. MacCracken remained in hiding until the senate was not in session, and then emerged and sought to persuade Sergeant-at-Arms Jurney to arrest him so that he might make use of a writ of habeas corpus he already had obtained, and thus get the matter at once into the civil courts. But Jurney hid himself, locked up the warrant and refused to act until MacCracken could be brought immediately before the senate.

Next Justice O'Donaghue of the District Supreme court, who had granted the writ of habeas corpus, fined MacCracken $100 for contempt in asserting that he was held in bodily restraint by Jurney, and the writ was invalidated. Thereupon Jurney arrested MacCracken on the senate warrant.

FORTY felons in the Washington state penitentiary at Walla Walla armed themselves with knives, shears and hammers and made a desperate attempt to break out of the prison. At the main gate the guards opened fire with machine guns and rifles, and a company of state militia rushed to the scene. When the battle was over it was found one turnkey and seven convicts had been killed and four guards and three felons injured.

GOVERNORS of all the states have received from the administration a draft of a model state recovery law which would make all national codes of fair competition automatically effective within the states. It would remove the threatening possibility of a constitutional barrier to the enforcement of those codes among concerns that do not deal in interstate commerce.

The model law would authorize the state governor to consent to the utilization of state and local officers by the President of the United States "in effectuating the policies of the national industrial recovery act." A violation of a code would be made a misdemeanor in the state with a penalty of $500 a day for each offense and for each day the violation continues. Where a license under the NRA is required, a person doing business without one would be liable to a fine of $500 or six months' imprisonment or both for each day of the violation. These state penalties are copied after those in the national industrial recovery act.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT having decided that the civilian conservation corps shall be maintained at full strength until March 31, 1935, orders to this effect have been sent to the commanding generals of all army areas. There will be two enrollment periods of six months each, the total number of men to be 300,000. Additional local experienced men will be enlisted in some of the states, in the eighth and ninth corps areas in the extreme West.

PENALTIES under the NRA petroleum code cannot be applied against oil companies that have not signed the code or that are engaged only in intrastate commerce, according to an opinion rendered by Federal Judge Randolph Bryant at Sherman, Texas. It was announced in Washington that the government would appeal the case to the United States Supreme court.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT called congressional leaders into conference and with them formulated bills designed to bring the stock markets of the country under federal control. The measures were then introduced in both house and senate. They deal with short selling, marginal trading, specialists, pool operations and manipulation.

BACKED by the President, a federal grand jury investigation was going on in Washington that promised to uncover a $10,000,000 scandal in the War department. Two lawyers prominently connected in the past with the American Legion were said to be involved. It was asserted that automobile manufacturers had been asked for a fee of $50,000 in return for War department contracts for trucks running into millions.

GEN. VASSILY BLUECHER, commander of the Soviet army in the Far East, went to Moscow to attend the all-union Communist party congress, and he told that gathering that Japan is preparing to make war on Russia, offering "proof" of that statement. The general, however, asserted that the Soviet state was ready for the coming conflict. "The Red army," said he, "is generally strengthened. We have encircled our frontiers by iron and concrete. They will be sufficiently strong to break any imperialist head that comes against them."

In support of his charge that Japan is making an armed base of Manchukuo, General Bleucher made these statements:

That Japan has sponsored construction of about 620 miles of railroads in north Manchukuo in the last two years, 65 per cent of which he regards as economically unnecessary.

That about 1,867 miles of highways have been opened in the same region; and,

That 50 aviation bases have been concentrated north of Mukden.

He said Japan has 130,000 troops and 500 airplanes in Manchuria, in addition to "110,000 to 115,000 soldiers of the Manchukuo army and 12,000 white guards, capable of bearing arms."

REPRESENTATIVES of business groups in Washington said they were fairly well satisfied with the new revenue bill which was brought before the house, though there were some objectionable provisions which they hoped might be removed by the senate finance committee later. The bill now represents a compromise between the recommendations of the Hill subcommittee and the suggestions of the Treasury department. The chief changes are those with respect to depreciation, consolidated returns and corporate reorganizations. The bill does not reduce depreciation allowances as did the subcommittee recommendations. Nor does it abolish consolidated returns for affiliated corporations. While it imposes an extra tax on corporation earnings when consolidated returns are filed, this is not so objectionable as the entire elimination of the privilege.

While the upper surtax brackets have been scaled up somewhat they do not increase greatly the tax applying to a person who has an earned income credit. The tax burden is increased somewhat on a person without earned income, but with corporation dividends and government bonds not subject to normal taxes which are reached by commencing surtaxes above a single 4 per cent normal tax instead of above normal rates aggregating 8 per cent.

The movement for a general sales tax is not expected to get far. There is much less sentiment for it than in 1932. This is chiefly because President Roosevelt is supposed to be against it.

Tarred With Same Stick

Washington.—If I read the signs correctly, neither the Democratic nor the Republican party is going to be able to do any shouting in the campaign next fall about the graft and corruption that has taken place while the other party is in power. The clothing of each party bears indelible stains on that score, and if one could overlook the serious character of the malfeasance that has taken place, there might be occasion for a laugh. That is to say, neither party can point the finger of scorn at the other and plead purity before the voters.

Just as Senator Black of Alabama, a Democrat, head of a senate investigating committee, turns up some "pay dirt" in digging into fraud in the award of ocean mail and air mail contracts under the Hoover administration, a District of Columbia grand jury turns out indictments charging fraud in the award of contracts for the purchase of millions of dollars worth of motor trucks for the army under the Roosevelt administration. Actually, the disclosures came within 24 hours of each other, although naturally the Black discoveries were of incidents that took place about two years ago. It does not change the picture, however, from the political standpoint. Each party has found slime in its own household, and neither can deny it before the voters next November.

In addition to the motor contract fraud charges that the Democrats must explain away, there have been numerous cases throughout the country of petty graft in connection with Civil Works administration affairs. None of these have been of more than local consequence in that they usually involved only one or two persons hardly known outside of their own communities, but they have made up in numbers that which they lacked in size. And from the partisan standpoint, they constitute the basis of trouble for the party in power when they occur. The reason is that the average person in those communities will know all about that kind of crookedness, whereas a gigantic conspiracy of the type alleged in the air mail contracts or those involving the motor trucks seems rather outside of the picture because they have no local connections. In other words, we don't know the people concerned.

But, the President has moved with considerable speed on the charges in each instance. He ordered Postmaster General Farley to cancel the air mail contracts, not one but all of them, and turned the job of carrying the air mail over to the army. He ordered Attorney General Cummings to go after the alleged crookedness in the motor truck case, with the resulting indictments. All of which seems to give the present administration the advantage in the political battles that may be expected in the campaign, yet the opinions I hear around Washington do not support that view. The observers and analysts insist that neither political party can make much use of the argument about fraud without stirring up a fresh mess for itself.

Mail Subsidies

There is, and always has been, a sharp difference of views about granting subsidies for carrying the air mail and the ocean mail. Aside from the fraud charges, it appears there is a natural basis upon which opinion may be divided. Roughly, those who favor the subsidies do so because it is the one way in which our government may encourage by direct aid the expansion of an industry. Those who favor subsidies point out, for example, that the millenium has not been reached and that war is not banished from the earth. Why, then, they ask, should not the air craft industry and the shipping industry be encouraged to go ahead, develop, expand, experiment, produce bigger and better ships and planes? If there be war, those ships and those planes are available for government service. They are built; they are ready, and the government can command them. Besides, if there be war, the industries concerned will have plants and equipment and plans. Production of ships and planes for war can go forward at wartime speed. Thus, say the subsidy advocates, subsidies for air mail and for ocean mail actually are for defense of the realm in their full effect.

Then, there is the question of American predominance in the field of commerce. Other nations subsidize their shipping, their air craft industry. It is only by use of the subsidies, which means paying more for the service rendered than it actually is worth, can we keep pace with foreign nations in those two fields.

As a matter of cold fact, the use of subsidies is the reason why the American air craft industry has grown and now equals or exceeds the same industry anywhere else in the world. As a further matter of fact, the use of subsidies has kept a good deal of American shipping alive and, thereby, has kept American exporters from falling into the clutches of foreign shipping companies who would have no competition in numerous routes were the Americans to withdraw.

Those who attack the subsidies, however, claim they constitute a vile discrimination. They allege them to be unjust use of taxpayers' money, because they suck cash from the treasury that should be used for general purposes of government.

Further, it is the claim of subsidy opponents that such payments produce monopolies, drive out domestic competition which might not fall within the formula for subsidy payments. Generally, the opposition claims that subsidies add to the strength of the rich and the taxpayers carry the burden. This extra load, the figures show, amounted to $54,453,000 in the last five years.

As far as I can see, and I have done considerable research work on the question, the arguments of neither side are infallible. Each side, in supporting its view, is not wholly motivated by utilitarian or nationalistic sentiment.

Take Themselves Seriously

I have always held the conviction that each of us, as an individual, is and can be no more than just one of the teeming millions inhabiting this old earth, and, holding that belief, I never have thought that any of us ought to be impressed with his own importance. In other words, "don't take yourself too seriously." But my philosophy of life apparently is not shared by members of congress. Most of them do take themselves seriously, very seriously.

In proof of my statement, permit me to call attention to a small uproar that was created among several members of the house of representatives because officials and staff of the Farm Credit administration failed to do a hop, skip and jump when the house members sought something or other from the credit administration offices. The house members became so wrathy that they decided they wanted to investigate the credit administration.

The rules committee of the house, the committee that really determines whether proposals for action by the house shall ever get before that body, had Dr. William I. Myers, farm credit administrator, before it. Doctor Myers was told that there had been numerous charges of graft and irregularity in credit administration affairs and the house members were trying to decide whether to delve into them. In the midst of this discussion, Representative O'Connor, a New York Democrat, burst forth with what the newspaper correspondents seemed to think was the real reason for the flareup about credit administration affairs.

"The main reason we are considering an investigation," said Representative O'Connor, "is because we have trouble with farm credit officials whose salaries we appropriate and whose jobs we create, and who think we have no control over them."

The New York representative called the credit administration "the department that sneers at congressmen," and Representative Carpenter of Nebraska, also a Democrat, said he had tried to get an appointment with Doctor Myers but had failed to get by the administrator's secretary. At this point, Representative Werner of South Dakota, another Democrat, chimed in with an observation that "when you go down to the Farm Credit administration, they laugh at you."

Doctor Myers denied any intent on his part or on the part of his staff to snub members of congress, but the representatives certainly felt they had been snubbed.

Playing Politics

While it is no grief of mine whether a member of the house or senate wants to have everybody kotow to him, I continue to be a friend of the executive branch of our government and that friendship results from many years of observation of its capacity to get things done. The records of congress through the years show distinctly, as far as I am concerned, how few times it has risen up to the full measure of the country's demands upon it. It has persisted in "playing politics," and the amount of demagoguery that is printed in the Congressional Record each day is enough to choke several of the best cows in the neighborhood. And, under present conditions, I am moved to ask why, if these house members and senators are so important, they obey the party whip and do as they are told every time there is a bill sent to congress from the White House.

From a long period of observation, I believe that representatives and senators do get most of the things they seek from the various offices in the executive departments of the government. Time after time, constituents of a representative or senator will come to Washington, seeking favors or perhaps speed on a legitimate proposition and they ask their representative or their senator to help. I have been in offices and have heard senators or representatives telephone the office in the executive branch that is concerned, and they do not mince words in admonishing the man at the other end of the wire that a specific thing must be done. And, if it is within reason, it is done, too.

GOOD JUDGMENT CALLED FOR IN RAISING CHILD

I know a family whose children I have watched grow to maturity. They had money; the children had not only a good nurse but a fine nursery governess as well.

Yet these children are frail and white. None of them seem to have the healthy stamina to which they were entitled. What was wrong?

I remember two things. They were insufficiently fed and were subjected to a rather heroic form of fresh-air treatment when little.

If the point is unprovable that too careful a diet and too much cold air will not undermine strength, it does prove, at least in this case, that they will not guarantee it either.

These children were sent out daily to play for long cold hours. They were warmly dressed, of course, and provided with things to keep them active and busy. But the neighbors used to shudder at the rigid regimen that took no account of the thermometer.

Their five o'clock nursery supper consisted of a light cereal and milk.

It is never sensible to go to extremes with children, to make rigid rules that won't stretch on occasion and make concessions to common sense.

Fresh air is good, but time, place, kind and quantity do play an important part. It is the same with food. Care in diet is important but not the care that verges on starvation.

Good judgment works more miracles than unbendable codes.—Olive Roberts Barton, in the New York World-Telegram.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Caledonia—Eight hundred Houston county farmers have signed corn and hog production reduction contracts.

Mantorville—Fire caused extensive damage to one of the state's oldest hotels, the Hubbell House, constructed in 1856.

Pine Island—The largest druggist in the country is located here. He is E. M. Marsh, who tips the scales at 404 pounds.

Cambridge—A $50,000 bond issue will be decided at an election and if approved the money would be used to construct an addition to the school house.

St. Paul—Thousands waited until the last day to purchase their license plates, but many more have failed to send in their applications, making a penalty due.

Rosewood—A flock of about 50 ducks moved northward through Marshall county, and, owing to the early season, is believed by old-timers to be an indication of an early spring.

Fulda—Game Warden Dudley Brady of Windom escaped an icy bath when his car plunged through the ice of a lake near here at a spot where the water was only a few feet deep.

St. Peter—Leaders of secondary education in 40 southern counties of the state attended a conference of the Association of Central Minnesota School Men at Gustavus Adolphus College here.

Caledonia—Moving pictures, discussions of alfalfa, soil and poultry and entertainment will occupy visitors at four farmers and homemakers institutes at Spring Grove February 27, Houston February 28, Hokah March 1 and Caledonia March 2.

Baudette—Two of three cow elk placed in the Red Lake game preserve last spring were shot by Alfred Scifres, who pleaded guilty to a charge of hunting illegally. He was fined $100. The hides and 250 pounds of meat were found in his possession.

Minneapolis—Hopes of continuing air mail service on the Twin Cities run faded when the postoffice department turned down an offer of the Northwest Airways to fly the mail without compensation. The army took over the routes in the U. S.

St. Paul—Official Washington has branded the Twin Cities as breeding grounds for criminals and as the two cities in the country which really need cleaning up. This came after the Bremer family was criticized for failing to cooperate with authorities.

Cass Lake—Terming the treaty with Chippewa Indians prohibiting sale of liquor in the area covered by the treaty in 1855 as obsolete, residents in this vicinity have petitioned Congressman Knutson to use his influence to amend the bill passed at the last congressional session which opened part of the territory to liquor sales and left the remainder dry.

Faribault—The entire district surrounding Faribault, where Walter Magee paid the $200,000 ransom for Edward Bremer is being combed for traces of the abductors. All residents in the vicinity of the place where the ransom was turned over and in the district where Bremer was released from a small sedan were questioned in the hope that some eyewitness could be located.

Minneapolis—Minnesota will become the foremost refuge for wild life in the nation if the report of President Roosevelt's committee on conservation is adopted. Under the recommendations in the committee's report, $756,000 would be allocated to Minnesota for the purchase of lands to be used in the preservation of game. This is more money than is recommended for any other state in the union.

Minneapolis—Neil M. Cronin, chairman of the Minneapolis-St. Paul regional labor board was appointed labor compliance officer for Minnesota by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, national recovery administrator. His new post, a salaried position, will not interfere with his duties as head of the labor board, he said. His work will be to investigate complaints of violations of labor provisions of the NRA codes in an attempt to settle them before they develop into labor disputes.

Minneapolis—Liquor drinkers may continue to consume prune juice and bathtub gin out of fancy bottles, but after March 7 they will know, at least, that they are not drinking good liquor, David R. Arundel, state liquor control commissionner, said after studying the new regulations approved by the federal alcohol control administration earlier this week. The new federal regulations require that every bottle of distilled spirits bear a label describing the kind, type, nature and general standard of the contents, and the label shall be worded so as not to create a misleading impression by being untrue in any particular.

Willmar—Work has been completed on the new highway bridge spanning the Great Northern tracks south of Spicer on trunk highway No. 4. Approximately $14,000 was expended in its construction.

Moorhead—Two Minneapolis men who shot and wounded Deputy Sheriff Peter Jesten during an attempted jail break here will face charges of assault with intent to kill. The two are Fred Jewell and Kenneth Albright, both 23. They had been held in jail here on charges of burglarizing a filling station near Glyndon.

The count nodded. A tinge of color had come back to his lean cheeks and there was a deep glow in his eyes. "Ma foi, monsieur, but you are as sound in your argument as you are magnanimous. Then you really intend to grant us a third, no matter what may yet be found?"

"We do, sir," Doctor White answered, "no matter if we find the treasure of the Inca—or a cannon stuffed with pearls to the very muzzle of her."

Robert burst into a ringing laugh, and looked at the count. "I think we've jolly well got to play the game after that, papa."

Doctor White looked in some bewilderment from one to the other. He failed utterly to grasp the situation. Tom and Jessica were no less puzzled.

The count, suddenly animated, threw out his hands. "You have just offered to give us the plate and these three guns," he cried, shifting to more fluent French. "The gift of plate we accept with gratitude, not only because of its historic family interest, but as a souvenir of the fairest and most honorable dealing that it has ever been my good fortune to encounter. But since you have so disinterestedly stated your just intention toward us, we no longer desire more than our third share of the value of these guns."

The three Americans stared at count de Corlay in astonishment. Then Tom choked back a laugh. Doctor White glanced at him and frowned. "But, my dear count," he said, "there is nothing in these guns. You just saw me sound them."

Robert chuckled. "My aunt, Doctor, but you're a hard man to crowd treasure on."

"What d'ye mean, treasure?" Tom demanded. "What are three brass cannons worth?"

Robert continued his chuckling. "Tell them, papa—"

The count's fine face was fairly scintillating. Then, with some effort he checked his overpowering excitement and smiled. "Are you quite sure that they are brass?"

Tom, suddenly pale, leaned down and scratched at the brazen surface he had already exposed. Straightening up again he shook his head. There was a look of pity on his face.

"Somebody—your ancestor or some other joker must have been kidding, Count. They're brass. With more copper, perhaps, than the brass we make today, but brass. Did you think they might be gold?"

"Sapristi!" roared the count, "but they are gold, young man. They are solid gold. They are the guns of the Holy Trinity!"

Doctor White was conscious of a sudden lifting of the diaphragm. The situation, with its puzzling complications, became clear to him almost in an instant. With a comprehensive glance at the count he repeated the words, "The Holy Trinity?"

"Precisely, sir. They were cast of melted votive offerings in the church of the Santa Trinidad, the Holy Trinity, and other contributions in gold for the defense of Ciudad Trinidad up in the mountains of Peru. This early Spanish mission was presided over by one Father Pietro, of the Brotherhood of Jesus, who like most of his cult was a man of distinguished learning and abilities. Informed that pirates were coming to attack the place he summoned his people to fetch in their gold, and from that he cast these guns." He had been taught the process of tempering gold by an old Inca chief who was devoted to him, and it is probable that he made his powder from the charcoal and sulphur and saltpeter that was obtainable in that region."

The count paused for breath. Tom managed to mutter, "By gorry, I might have guessed it from the weight of them."

"That brave effort failed," count de Corlay resumed, still speaking French. "The mission was destroyed, put to fire and sword, and these pirates must have discovered the secret of the guns. Thereafter they passed from hand to hand, eventually to be captured by my ancestor, who took them from a buccaneer ship, Purisima Concepcion, which he destroyed. They were then covered, as now, by this coating of gum, and the character of their metal was unsuspected. My ancestor was set to thinking in the manner that Mr. Jordan has just mentioned. By their astonishing weight. He knew something of metallurgy and found occasion to make some tests, when he discovered that aqua regia alone was able to erode their surface. Even that reacted more slowly than upon virgin gold."

Tom, staring at the three pieces of ordnance that had been so carelessly dumped down upon the beach, gave a long, low whistle. Then, with Yankee practicality he said, "They'll react to a hacksaw, I reckon," and looked at Jessica.

But Doctor White was not thinking of that consideration. His mind was at work on the idea of argumentum ad hominum, and how easily he might have fallen victim to such had not the honor of these Frenchmen spurned it on discovering that they had in turn to deal with a just man whose fairness they were content to abide by and whose mere word was enough to make them feel safe in their astonishing revelation.

The doctor's eyes glistened as he contemplated the honor done him. He felt incapable of speech. His throat swelled. Some acknowledgement being in order he merely bowed, first to the count and then to Robert. His salute was gravely returned by each. No more was necessary. The two Frenchmen understood.

CHAPTER XIII

"About seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, as I figure it," said Tom, in notes of awe to Jessica. "Split three ways."

"Of which one whole third goes to you," said Jessica.

"So I'm told, and for what I'd gladly have paid a premium for the privilege of doing. That seems to be the way of this world. Here I've worked like billy-o at something or other for twenty years—since I was ten—for scarcely any pay at all, and now all of a hop I'm handed a fortune for nothing at all."

Count de Corlay and Doctor White and Robert came out from the doctor's little laboratory, where they had been subjecting some filings of the gun to analytic tests. Both were skilled chemists, the count at the head of a recently established fixed nitrogen laboratory.

"What's the assay, papa?" Robert asked.

"Only about 99 per cent pure, mon petit," the count answered dryly. "It is as I predict'. The hardening process was entirely one of temperatures, and not of alloy. There is no copper, no sulphur, nothing but gold, I should say."

"Will this tempering affect its value?" Tom asked.

"Why yes. It ought to increase it very considerably. About the only fault to be found with gold is its softness."

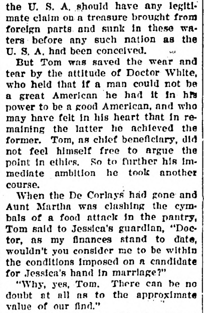
"And its weight," said Tom, without much thought.

"I say, Tom, did you ever hear any johnny grousing about the burden of his gold?"

"I'll bet your honored ancestor did when it went down under him," Tom retorted.

"Right, old bean. But we sha'n't have to complain over excess weight when our respective ministers of finance get through with us," Robert stated.

This dark prophesy already had furnished Tom a bitter cud to ruminate. Like a good many people of this epoch there was some discrepancy between his workaday commercial and his civic honesty. He was entirely willing to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, provided his conscience assured them that they were actually Caesar's. But he failed to see why the U. S. A. should have any legitimate claim on a treasure brought from foreign parts and sunk in these waters before any such nation as the U. S. A. had been conceived.



"What D'ye Mean, Treasure?" Tom Demanded.

But Tom was saved the wear and tear by the attitude of Doctor White, who held that if a man could not be a great American he had it in his power to be a good American, and who may have felt in his heart that in remaining the latter he achieved the former. Tom, as chief beneficiary, did not feel himself free to argue the point in ethics. So to further his immediate ambition he took another course.

When the De Corlays had gone and Aunt Martha was clashing the cymbals of a food attack in the pantry, Tom said to Jessica's guardian, "Doctor, as my finances stand to date, wouldn't you consider me to be within the conditions imposed on a candidate for Jessica's hand in marriage?"

"Why, yes, Tom. There can be no doubt at all as to the approximate value of our find."

"Then," said Tom, "if other things are equal, I'm free to marry her?"

"Free as this ocean air, my boy. The other things are equal, I think."

"Thanks, Doctor. Then, all that being conceded and hoped for, we both would like to get married before very long. Say the day after tomorrow. Jessica has got something else she wants to do tomorrow."

[THE END].

Tributes for Those Who Only "Stand and Wait"

"Every important life story has two aspects," says the famous Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick: "The things a man has energy enough to do and the things a man has stability enough to stand."

That is of special interest to women, is the comment of a celebrated woman writer, for it is particularly true with women that much of what we are able to accomplish depends on how much we can stand.

The hardest battles are not always fought in the field of action. Indeed most of us have at some time said: "It's so much easier when there's something you can do." Sometimes the most important "doing" consists of "standing" something that is hard to stand.

The "energy to do" is, of course, an important thing. In this rushing, bustling, competitive world, we all have need of it. But there are circumstances in everyone's life when that is uncalled for, when it is useless, when the problem at hand is one it cannot solve. That is the time usually when it is not energy, but standability that is needed to win through. Strength, yes, but the strength of balance and stability, the strength not to go out and do, but to stand and take it, to stand and withstand.

If I were faced with a choice of the two qualities, I should say that the person is better off, particularly if she is a woman, who has her abundance in that steadiness and stability that can stand things, than one who has instead merely a surplus of energy. For the former is the quality most needed in the exigencies of daily life, needed most often and then most desperately. And it is a quality that depends entirely upon itself, that is not fed by outside stimulus, as energy and activity may be.

In a line of the poet, Milton, there is thought on one kind of "standing things":

"They also serve who only stand and wait."

HAVE VISION OF FLYING AT 554 MILES AN HOUR

An airplane capable of flying 554 miles an hour, using existing engines, could be built today by applying known aerodynamic principles to its design and construction, according to John Stack of the national advisory committee for aeronautics. This is 131 miles an hour faster than the present speed record.

What such a high-speed plane would be like is described by Mr. Stack in the first issue of the Journal of the Aeronautical Sciences, reprinted in the Literary Digest. It would differ only slightly in form from the transport planes used on transcontinental airways.

The wings of the hypothetical plane would span 29.1 feet; the fuselage would be 40 inches in diameter. The plane would have completely retractable landing gear or would be catapulated like the early Wright planes, and could land on its fuselage. The engine and pilot would be completely enclosed, vision for the pilot being provided by windows or indirectly by mirrors. The wings would be centered on the fuselage.

A model of this plane has been tested in wind-tunnels and bears out Mr. Stack's calculations. The plane would have a landing speed of 103 miles an hour—a dangerous speed, but one which could perhaps be cut with proper auxiliary devices. The same kind of plane, equipped with 3,000 horse-power engines and new types of propellers, could fly at a computed speed of 600 miles an hour, or nearly 80 per cent of the speed of sound.

Why Doctors Favor a Liquid Laxative

A doctor will tell you that the careless use of strong laxatives may do more harm than good.

Harsh laxatives often drain the system, weaken the bowel muscles, and even affect the liver and kidneys.

Fortunately, the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form. The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be regulated to suit individual need. It forms no habit; you needn't take a "double dose" a day or two later.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin gently helps the average person's bowels back to regularity. Why not try it? Some pill or tablet may be more convenient to carry. But there is little "convenience" in any cathartic which is taken so frequently, you must carry it with you, wherever you go!

Its very taste tells you Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is wholesome. A delightful taste, and delightful action. Safe for expectant mothers, and children. All druggists, ready for use, in big bottles. Member N. R. A.

Harold Titus

The Distinguished Author of Our New Serial "Code of the North"

When Harold Titus locates a story in the north woods he has a setting with which he is familiar. He knew the north woods; he knew lumber camps; he knew the lumber "jacks" and their ways, for he was born and raised with them. He is a native of Traverse City, Grand Traverse county, Michigan. His lullaby when an infant was the ring of the woodsman's ax and the crash of the pine and spruce as they fell. He spent his boyhood days amidst the lumber camps that then dotted northern Michigan. He harks back to the stirring scenes of those boyhood days when he wants a setting and characters for the kind of a story he finds joy in writing.

Harold Titus is a graduate of the University of Michigan. In school he showed a decided bent for a job of writing, and he followed it up after graduating by securing a reporter's position on the Detroit News. Then the call of the beauty of the outdoors caused him to go back to his home county and write, with the growing of fruit as a side line.

When the World war came he enlisted in the American army and served throughout the conflict as a sergeant in the ordnance service, which gave him experiences and settings for more stories. With the close of the war he went back to his stories and his fruit farm, but for a time served as conservation commissioner for the state.

Harold Titus has produced a number of stories that have achieved distinction. Among them may be mentioned, "Conquered," "Bruce of the Circle," "The Last Straw," "Timber," "The Beloved Pawn," "Below Zero" and many others, the latest of which is "Code of the North," which will appear serially in these columns, the time of which is the lumbering days of the north, and the setting and characters are those with which he was familiar as a boy. It is an especially good story, with an abundance of action, depicting stirring adventures and a charming romance.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

School days are happy days School time is caution time.

Let's not forget it men. The little folks are at our mercy. They are full of youthful energy and enthusiam and in their excitement, of course, are apt to do certain things they should not do.

That care-free little tot, hustling across the street with the First Reader under the arm, is in reality a human being - - breathing and living a youthful life. That little life is just as important in the movement of the world as your own.

Lets give the kid an extra break, not just for one day, but all of the time. Let's give those little tots the whole road if they want it. They very seldom ask for it for long, and if they want it just for a moment, why argue or take unnecessary chances that endanger their lives.

A life that is breathing is worth saving. The privilege of driving should not be greater than the privilege to live.

A Toast To The Peach

THIS headline sounds like lifting your glass to a pretty girl, but it refers to a delicious recipe which has the luxurious sound of being something very new and special. Yet it is simply made, and very quickly, too. Serve it either for dessert or for Sunday morning breakfast. It will make a decided hit with anyone who loves peaches—and who doesn't? Here's the recipe:

Peach Toast: Beat one egg slightly. Add three-quarters of a cup of milk, one teaspoon of sugar and a quarter of a teaspoon of salt. Dip slices of bread in this milk and sauté a golden brown. Use eight slices of bread. Dip eight halves of canned peaches in flour and also sauté golden in the skillet. Place one peach half on each slice of toast and pour over it the following sauce:

Sauce: Melt one tablespoon of butter, add one tablespoon of flour and stir smooth. Add one cup of peach syrup slowly, stirring constantly until smooth and thick. Season with cinnamon and pour over the peach toast. Serve hot. This can also be served with waffles and wheat cakes.

Peaches of Great Price

And here's another recipe for peaches which is so highly prized that they have given it the name of Golden Nuggets: Add one-half cup sugar to the contents of an 8-ounce can of sliced peaches, and boil gently until the syrup is thick. Cool, and drain off syrup. Have eight small cup cakes made of any good white cake batter and flavored with orange flavoring. Lay three slices of drained peaches on top of each cake. Cover with boiled icing, flavored with orange and tinted yellow, so the peaches are entirely concealed. This makes eight golden nuggets.*

Upper Grades

Opal Sanoden was the winner of the Quick-Thinking Contest Friday. Lyla and Lucille were first in the sixth and seventh grades respectively.

The sixth graders studied the shortened forms you'll, I'll, we'd, etc., and learned that they were called contractions. Several days later when one of our buddies was asked what such shortened forms were called, his tongue slipped a bit and he replied: "Oh, they are called Contraptions!"

The eighth graders are displaying vast scholastic tendencies. Not one failed to tuck a mathematics book neatly under the left arm when making the exit from this part of the Knowledge Dispensary Monday afternoon. However one young lady apparently lost the urge for mathematical information upon reaching the cloak hall as fifteen minutes later a book was accidentally discovered blissfully at rest under cover of a stray wool scarf and a spent cotton mitten.

The eighth graders had speed drills in mathematics Tuesday. Opal and Bernice finished first of the whole group. Arnold and Clarin finished first of the boys.

Lorna worked most rapidly on the seventh grade mathematics exercise Tuesday.

A very good variety of plant slips and seeds was brought to school by Clarin for use in general science.

High School

The George Washington program given to the High School students by the upper grades was enjoyed very much.

In the Biology class reports are being given on some scientists who are important in the field of Biology.

The General Science Class have begun to study about the steam engine.

A number of new books have have been added to our library. They are now ready for circulation.

Inauguration Day on Sunday

Inauguration day has fallen on Sunday only four times since that date was fixed. It was Sunday for President Taylor in 1849, for President Hayes in 1877, for President Monroe in 1821, and for President Wilson in 1917. Had March 4 been retained for inaugurations, the next time it would have fallen on Sunday would been 1945.

Historical Essay Contest

Sponsored by the Marshall County Historical Society, and Supervised by Nels M. Engen, County Supt. of Schools. Warren.

In order to increase the interest of the children of Marshall County in the history of the county, and especially to find and collect interesting historical facts, the Marshall County Historical Society is offering a series of cash prizes for the best written, and most interesting and historically valuable accounts of some incidents or experience of their parents, grandparents, or neighbors, before the year 1895.

The stories must be true and deal with the early settlement of the county, as to where people came from; their journey into the county; their means of transportation; the clearing of land; early roads; how they lived, home made furniture, household and farm utensils and tools; home made clothes; what hardships they endured; original ways of farming and threshing; ways of doing business; contact with people of note; contact with Indians; the social life of the early days; anecdotes about interesting people; the organization of townships, societies and politics; the establishment of early educational institutions and early education; the early religious life and the first churches; the origin of names of places, and communities; the first settlers in a community; the location and names of first houses and public places; the transition from wildness to civilization. Any one or all of these suggestions may be dealt with provided they have real, true, historical value and interest. Be sure to be specific, giving dates, names and places.

The contest is open to the children in the two upper grades in all the schools of the county whether such school be public, private or parochial.

The narrative should not be less than five nor more than ten pages size 8½ inches by 11 inches neatly written in ink, in the child's own handwriting, on one side of the paper only. These papers must be in the hands of the teachers by the 16th of April. The teacher in each school will select the two best papers or appoint competent judges to select the two best papers turned in. These two papers marked "contest papers", together with all other stories written must be sent to Mr. Engen not later than April 23rd. The two best papers from each school will compete for the cash prizes. However all papers will be kept and filed in the office of the Marshall County Historical Society. Each writer will state at the close of his paper the name and address of the person or persons from whom he obtained information for his story. Each paper must be signed by the pupil, giving the name of school and teacher.

The papers will be judged by competent and impartial judges appointed by the Historical Society, and will be preserved as a part of the records of the Marshall County Historical Society.

The prizes are: First Prize, $5.00; Second Prize, $3.00; Third Prize $2.00.

Mud Lake Place For Ducks

Mud Lake is one of twenty areas that have been recommended by the state game and fish division of the conservation department for waterfowl nesting grounds under President Roosevelt's national agricultural land retirement program. This fact was made public by Erling Swenson, state conservation commissioner in a speech before the Moorhead Rod and gun club recently.

While declaring that probably only a half dozen sites will be approved and purchased with the $759,000 alloted to Minnesota, Swenson said the department considers most important the proposed Mud Lake area of 80,000 acres in Marshall county, which may cost approximately $180,000, and expressed belief it will head the list of areas selected

The lists of projects, listing first the lake or stream and following that, the county, follows: Roseau, Marvin and Twin in Roseau and Kittson; Mud Lake in Marshall; Red Lake river marshes in Pennington and Red Lake: Beltrami marshes in Polk; Egg lakes in Becker; upper and lower Rice in Clearwater; Poposki lake in Beltrami; Craigville marshes in Itasca; Big Rice and Mud lakes, Boy river in Cass; Boot lake in Aitkin; Portage, Perch, Kettle and Dead Fish in Carlton; Ogechie and Shakopee in Mille Lacs; Rice and Skunk in Morrison; Traverse lake in Traverse; Spellman, Gullekson in Yellow Medicine; Tal-Cot, Berry lakes, Des Moines river in Cottonwood; Wallnut, Rice group in Faribault; Bear lake in Freeborn; Sand Prairie in Wabasha; Prairie Island in Dakota and Wabasra; Prairie Island in Dakota-Goodhue.

No Muskrat Trapping Season

By action of the Minnesota Conservation Commission there will be no legal open season for the trapping of muskrats in Minnesota in 1934. A survey covering the entire state conducted through game wardens and sportsmen's organizatios showed the need of protecting this popular furbearer in the state if a good brood stock was to remain for the next season.

The muskrat population has decreased considerably because of the dry condition of sloughs, marshes, swamps and the virtual drying up of a number of small lakes that have in the past been ideal breeding and feeding grounds for muskrats, Charles McFarlane, deputy director of the Division of Game and Fish, stated.

Rowe Has Filed For Judge

We have just received a few lines from W. E. Rowe in Crookston stating that he has filed as a candidate for district judge.

Mr. Rowe is well along in the years and has a wide range of experince in all legal matters.

We believe that inasmuch as that two district judges are to be elected in this district this year, Mr. Rowe is well qualified to fill one of the vacancies on the bench.

CHAPTER I

—1—

The wind swept in long, savage blasts, driving its cold through layers of wool, through a man's flesh, straight into his bones.

Snow came, fine snow, stinging blizzard snow; it clung to the man's clothing, to his eyebrows and mantled the burden on his shoulders.

Now and again he lifted his head from the bending which protected his face somewhat from the drive of the storm and spoke.

"All right, Stevie?" he would ask.

From the huddle up there, which was a pack-sack with a blanket drawn over the small boy riding in it, would come a whimper.

"Foots are cold!"

"Wiggle 'em, Stevie! Wiggle 'em fast!" the man would say and plunge on, with something like desperation in the grit of his snowshoes through the loose covering of old snow, pulling the ends of the blanket which he held in his hands a bit closer to keep the child's head and shoulders covered.

The man was frightened. It showed in his pace, which was too swift for long journeying, showed in his excited breathing, which the effort of even forced travel alone would not have produced; showed, also, in the way he turned frequently to look backward, as if fearful of pursuit.

For the first hour it had not been so bad. It was cold, yes, and blowing a bit, still, the conditions were not discouraging to a man with less than forty pounds on his back and with only twenty miles to go; not discouraging when necessity seasoned with desperation occasioned the trek. Even if it had been storming at the start and had the burden been much heavier, the effort would have been as nothing compared to the prospect of jail. . . .

But he had scarcely left behind the yellow squares of windows in Flynn's camp before the first outriders of snow squalls struck, and before he had covered a third of the way the blizzard roared down upon him.

For Drake, a blizzard was nothing new. For Drake alone, that is. But with a four-year-old on his back a storm like this was something else again.

And now the child for the first time volunteered a complaint:

"Daddy, my foots are cold!"

"Won't be long, now, Stevie; hang on; we'll get into a nice, warm place pretty quick, now!"

The little boy snuggled closer. The mittened hands which had rested on the man's shoulders under the protecting blanket worked forward, half embracing his father's neck.

Drake's breath caught and he shook his head to clear away the mist which formed in his eyes. Going back was out of the question. The thing which had driven him off would be discovered by now. A stop to attempt to warm the child would have been risky, even had he a belt-ax with which to knock up a shelter and fuel.

But it was a dozen miles yet to the railroad; a dozen miles, with the going getting rapidly worse and the cold increasing and his own strength, taxed by the demands of his physical necessity and the sappings of twin fears, ebbing steadily.

He edged to the left, now, watching the bank of the winter-locked stream, looking for an opening in the timber. Taking it, he would be forced to cross a bald ridge and face an even more intense sweep of the storm, but men said it saved three miles on the trip to town. Three miles, an hour's travel.

"Da-ddy!" The child whimpered a little for the first time.

"All right, Stevie! Won't be long, now. . . . Here we are!" He saw the leaning cedar and the opening of the trail and swung toward it.

The going was more difficult because loose snow had fallen to shin depth and lay unpacked by the wind. The cover yielded a measure of protection from the blizzard and this was welcome but the climb was a fresh demand on Drake's overworked lungs and heart and muscles. Breath began to sob in his throat and he staggered until the little boy clasped his neck in a hold that strangled.

"Don't, Stevie!"—pushing the small hands away. "Can't breathe . . . when you . . . do that. . . ."

The child began to cry softly and the man stopped, panting and swaying slightly.

"Wiggle your toes, Stevie! Dad'll take care of you. Hush now . . . Don't cry. . . . Please don't!"

Drake bent lower and drew the blanket tighter over his son's head. He began to exercise caution of a sort in his progress so he might surely mark the depression in the snow which was the trail. He must not leave that trail. He must not lose it for an instant! He told himself that, half aloud, between shut teeth and held his pace to a cautious plodding. The wind drove deeper than the marrow of his bones, now; it seemed to thicken the very blood flow in his heart; it seemed to penetrate his skull and numb his brain. . . .

And then, suddenly, he stopped. Every trace of a trail suddenly was gone.

He turned about and followed his own tracks, filling so rapidly with snow. There it went! He had edged to the left when the trail went straight ahead. He pressed forward with a feeling of relief and then fell sprawling. This caused Stevie to scream shrilly and commence to cry.

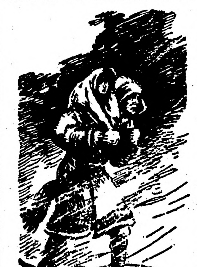
It took minutes for Drake to get up because he had broken through the mantled top of a down tree and could find so little purchase among the dry, brittle branches, and because he was trembling with a fresh and greater fear. No trail leads across a down top. He had missed it again!

"We're lost!" he cried. "Turned around, Stevie! We got to get back to the river, somehow!"

Drake began circling, panic stricken. The hulking figure that, many minutes behind, followed this aimless and changing and rapidly fading trail was panic stricken, as well. Never in all his experience had Jim Flynn been keyed up as he was now.

He realized that Drake had lost his way before he had been a-top that ridge ten minutes, because Jim knew the country as he knew his own shanty, back yonder at headquarters. He saw where the other had doubled after first losing the way, saw where he had fallen twice, read in the signs indications of panic. . . .

Then a sort of fear shook Flynn. He read the story in the snow and roared out into the hubbub of mad weather: "Drake! Hi, you, Drake!" A great, bellowing voice, his, but it was swallowed by the storm, reached nowhere, was as useless for its purpose as a whisper.



Every Trace of a Trail Suddenly Was Gone.

He traveled down-wind, now, running where sign showed clearly, most cautious in those places where it was faint. And then, through one of those brief lifts, he saw them, the man with his burden staggering along with a blanket trailing, and Flynn called out again with all the strength of lungs and throat.

If Drake heard he did not stop. He kept on and, after him, through the snow which seemed to fly even thicker, went Jim Flynn, a moose of a man.

"Hi, you! Come back from that, Drake! Keep away from that!"

For such a heavy man he made tremendous speed, but it was a tremendous need that drove him, now. He had to keep going, he must stop that other before he reached the rim that lay before him. It broke off like the edge of a table, he knew; it went down a hundred feet of almost sheer drop, with rocks jutting out from the face of the cliff to catch and mash and maim a man.

"Drake! You, Drake!"

His bellow carried, then, and he saw Drake turn his face over his shoulder, but he did not halt.

It was not until Flynn's great mittened hand caught him by the shoulder and spun him about and hurled him backward into the snow that Drake's flight was checked. Two more of those crazy strides and man and little boy would have been over and down. . . .

As he reeled backward, Drake cried, "Oh, Jim!" And then, as he cowered in the drift: "Oh, Jim! You found it out!"

Stevie was crying, a muffled sound, and old Jim dropped to his knees and lifted the little boy.

"Cryin'!" He said and choked a bit, as in relief. "Cryin', eh? Then it ain't too late!"

He jerked open his thick mackinaw, gathered the child in his arms and holding the small body firmly against his breast folded the heavy jacket over it.

"Put your face ag'in' my neck, Stevie. And you, Drake, come on; follow me close!"

The prostrate man made no move.

"Get up!" Flynn cried angrily and kicked at him with his snow-shoe. "Get on your feet! There's a trappers' cabin' half mile yonder. . . . Get up, I say!"

He stooped and grasped one of Drake's arms, dragging him to his laggard legs.

"You keep by me! Don't you dare try to quit, now, Drake! And come fast because . . . A little kid . . . in this!"

The pace he set was taxing but the trail he broke helped the exhausted man behind. They dropped down a steep slope and, beside a fold in the snow which was a tiny stream, came upon a small log cabin, window gone, door sagging on its hinges.

"Here we are, Stevie!" The voice was hearty, almost laughing, now, but the look in Flynn's eyes was harried. "Here we are!"

"My foots!" whimpered the child.

"In here, Drake," said Flynn and shouldered the door open. The other staggered behind him, leaning against the cabin wall, panting through open lips.

"Kick off your snow-shoes, you chump! Here hold th' laddy!"

He thrust the boy into his father's arms. The ruin of a sheet iron stove was in one corner, with pipe rusted and askew but still jointed. A rude bunk held a deep thickness of balsam boughs, brown and brittle. Tearing off an armful of these, Flynn thrust them into the stove and struck a match. Soon the twigs ignited and flames roared.

Out came Flynn's belt-ax and crashed into the framework of the bunk. In mere minutes lengths of tinder-dry aspen were burning and then Jim stripped off his mackinaw, hung it over the window and shoved Drake away from the doorway.

The drift about the entry was cleared, the door kicked into an approximation of its place and then Jim turned to the other.

"Work up some more wood now. Your cheek's frosted but that don't count. . . . Here, Stevie, come to old Jim!"

"Foots!" the boy wailed. "My foots!"—as his father surrendered him.

"Hurt, do they? That's good; that's fine, Stevie! Hands hurt, too? Ain't that great? Nothin' frozen much about you, likely. . . . Not by a hair!"

Off came the small mittens, exposing reddened hands. Then the rubbers and socks were stripped from his feet. They were blue, with the toes curled up and Jim, holding first one, then the other, in his cupped hands blew on the discolored flesh, alternating this with brisk chafing.

"You missed freezing by a hair, sonny! Gosh, ain't it a relief that they hurt, though?"

He had seated himself on a worn bench and now swung the lad to his knees so that they faced one another. He fumbled at his shirt, opening the front, then ripped open his heavy undershirt, exposing his great chest.

"In they go, Stevie! Into old Jim's oven, now, where they'll warm up but not so fast as to make 'em hurt awful." He thrust the small feet in beneath his armpits, clamping down on them and holding them tight. "Now, tuck them cold hands down my back, Stevie. That's the lad! That's the little man! Now, we're going to warm up in a hurry!"

He wrapped his ponderous arms about the small body and rocked back and forth, crooning in a deep rumble.

Drake, in the meantime, had knocked more of the bunk into proper lengths, filled the stove and braced the pipe. Already the heat was penetrating their clothing, filling the room. They were sheltered from the wind, they had a fire, and although little Steve still sobbed with fright and pain, he was out of danger.

Never so long as he lived would Steve Drake forget the deliciousness of that sensation. At first he tugged at his throbbing feet, tried to draw away from the clamp of those heavy arms because the sharp pains of restored circulation shot clear to his hips. But the big man only crooned the louder and held him closer and kept saying that the hurt would soon be over, now, and that it was a good sign. He was right. The throb and burn died out and a tremendously sweet warmth began to seep through the small body. . . .

Feeling so comfortable took all the child's attention. It made him heedless of the things his father and Jim said to each other most of the time but, of course, no boy who is even half awake and not really hurting could be wholly heedless of the things that a boss as important as Jim Flynn said to his father a little later.

Neither can a boy see his father cry and not remember it. Drake did just that. For a long time he cried, as a little boy might cry, as Stevie had never seen any man cry, and Jim did not look at him; just looked other places and hummed some and seemed to be trying to think up something to say.

After a while he appeared to think of things, and what he said was what any boy would remember.

For instance: "You're a fool, Drake."

"Yes. . . . What a fool! I thought I could get away with it and you might never do anything about it, and a thousand dollars—"

"Oh, that!"—as if it didn't matter, and Jim cleared his throat with a great noise. "Wasn't thinkin' about that, Drake. About Stevie, here, I mean. Bad enough for a grown man to monkey with weather and get froze up, but takin' a fine little duffer like Stevie into it. . . . That's what proves you a fool."

"Sure. But I'm thinking about the money, Jim. . . . And that I'm a thief, now."

"Never mind that, Drake. Nobody, much, knows but us. And a thousand's nothing."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Science of Chemistry

The science of chemistry had its origin in remote antiquity. Many of its earlier secrets form the basis of modern knowledge. Early chemistry developed from gradual findings usually relating to the extraction of various metals from ores. Modern chemistry had been largely developed along industrial lines during the Nineteenth century, and since the World war enormous progress has been made.

Grand Forks.—University of North Dakota seniors won the 24th annual Carney song contest on the eve of the school's traditional Founder's day celebration, marking this year its 51st anniversary. The seniors received a $50 cash prize donated by E. Claude Carney, Minneapolis, an alumnus of the university.

Valley City.—Promising to become a traditional religious event in Valley City was a sacred concert staged by choirs from various churches in the city before an audience which overtaxed the seating capacity of the Epworth M. E. church here. Singers from seven choirs, about 150 voices, participated in the program.

Grand Forks.—The last two games of the four-game series between the University of North Dakota and the North Dakota State college were played here with the university winning the North Central Conference basketball championship for 1934, defeating the defending champions N. D. S. C. Bison.

Absaraka.—Mr. and Mrs. John L. Hay, pioneer Cass county residents, who are spending the winter months in Fargo with their son, recently celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary. Mr. and Mrs. Hay built the first house in Absaraka which, with other property they still have, was procured more than 50 years ago.

Williston.—Locating lost or stolen horses is a new service for Pilot E. M. Canfield and his plane. A farmer lost 12 horses and after a futile search by car, he concluded the horses might have been stolen. Within an hour after the deputy sheriff enlisted Pilot Canfield the horses were found fifteen miles from the owner's house.

Hettinger.—At the gravel pit near the Hettinger airport a tooth of a mastodon, prehistoric elephant, was found. It was compared with a similar tooth found near Bowman and which was identified as a tooth of a prehistoric elephant by the Smithsonian Institute. A museum is to be established by the Johnson-Melary post of the American Legion to which relics of any nature will be added.

Fessenden.—Fifteen Aberdeen Angus baby beeves which weighed an average of 958 pounds at 14 months of age won for Richard Price, Fessenden, top position in the 1932-1933 North Dakota carlot baby beef project of the N. D. A. C. extension service. This Wells county carlot averaged 20 pounds heavier than the second place Herefords entered by Fred Shallenberger, Hebron.

Bismarck.—Secretary of State Robert Byrne suffered minor bruises when a car driven by Dr. Lyle Priske of Bismarck, turned over on the highway east of Carrington.

Lisbon.—With the members being very satisfied with the business of the past year, the Ransom County Wool Growers named C. L. Smith, president; E. B. Knapp, vice-president; Verne Toyne, secretary, and Fred Yackley, treasurer. Plans were outlined whereby 50 per cent of the wool value would be advanced to members pooling their clip in 1934.

PROPER BUILDING OF CHECK DAMS WHERE NEEDED

To get the best results from check dams in gullies, tops of dams should be low enough in the middle and high enough at the ends to carry the runoff water after heavy rains without overflowing gully banks or washing soil around ends of dams, say engineers of the United States Department of Agriculture.

If dams are too high, the carrying capacities of gullies are reduced and water overflows their banks and washes around the ends of the dams, and can form new gullies down the slopes parallel to the old ones. Where dams are watertight the ends should extend far enough into the gully banks to prevent water seeping around the dams and washing away the sides of gullies.

Foundations of dams should extend far enough below the bottoms of the gullies so that hydraulic pressure will not force the water under the dams, to undermine and destroy them. The floors of gullies should be paved at the lower sides of the dams for sufficient length and width to prevent any erosion or undermining of the dams by water dropping over the crests.

Dams are built in gullies to cause their filling with sediment carried by runoff water and to check soil erosion. When gullies in cultivated fields are filled, farmers save much time and labor in cultivating and harvesting crops. Filled gullies in pasture lands eliminate danger of accidents to grazing animals.

Temporary dams usually are made of materials found on farms, such as stakes, brush, straw, logs and loose rock. Woven wire is also used. Most temporary dams are porous when first built, but the spaces gradually fill with trash and soil brought down by the water. Permanent dams are built of earth, masonry and concrete. The bureau of agricultural engineering at Washington can supply suggestions for constructing dams in gullies.

Vulgar Wealth

Too much money was for the classic Greek mind a form of excess, and excess was the thing he would not tolerate. To have too much money was to show a lack of decent restraint and was on a par with too much drink or any other vulgar exhibition of lack of self control.—Kansas City Times.

FEW OLD WORLD BISON

Despite the fact that the bison, incorrectly called buffalo, is a thoroughly American product, this animal did not have its origin in this incorrectly called buffalo, is a thorcountry, the scientist, Frank Thone, tells us. Like the American Indian, this authority states, the bison is an immigrant from the Old world, having crossed over from the Eurasian continent via the land bridge that once united Asia and Alaska. The few members of the original race of these animals still in existence in Europe, a mere dozen or so in number, are called wisent.

JOB'S COMFORTER

Young Man—Mr. Smith, your daughter has promised to be my wife.

Mr. Smith—It was your own fault—what else did you expect if you kept hanging round here every night?—Der Lustige Sachse.

Quite Impossible

She was reeling off her troubles to hubby at supper.

"That Mrs. Smith is a terrible gossip," she said huffily.

He sighed resignedly.

"Why do you think so, my dear?" he asked.

She sniffed.

"I simply can't tell her anything but that she says she's heard it before," his wife replied.

Confession

Friend—Doesn't it shock you to hear your daughter using expressions like "Oh, h—l?"

Mother—No, I envy her. I've wanted to use them myself a good many times, but with my strict bringing up I just can't get up enough nerve to spit them out, though I do think them.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Looking Ahead

Author—Would you advise me to get out a small edition of my book or a big one?

King Albert of Belgium, Killed by Fall While Mountain Climbing, Succeeded by Leopold—Three Great Powers Protect Austria.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

ONE of the best and most beloved of the few remaining kings, Albert I of Belgium, met a tragic death while practicing for his favorite sport, mountain climbing. He was attempting, alone, to scale a 90-foot pinnacle near Namur and fell, being probably instantly killed. Hours later his body was found and carried to Brussels. Queen Elizabeth was ill and was not told of the king's death for some hours. The Belgian nation was plunged in genuine mourning, and all the world sympathized, for Albert had won high esteem by his heroism during the World war and his just government of his people.

King Leopold

Albert is succeeded by Crown Prince Leopold, duke of Brabant, his eldest son. Leopold is thirty-two years old and was married in 1926 to Princess Astrid of Sweden. They have a daughter and a son. The new ruler was probably one of the youngest soldiers in the World war, enlisting as a private when he was thirteen years old. He was treated as an ordinary soldier, seeing active service in the trenches, and was a sergeant when the armistice was signed. His coronation was set for February 23, the day following the late king's funeral.

King Albert was the third of his line. He was born in 1875 and ascended the throne in 1909. Throughout the war he was one of the most active members of the Belgian army, continually at the front to help his troops and often in imminent danger of death. After the armistice he got the task of reconstruction well under way and then, with Queen Elizabeth and Prince Leopold, took journeys to the United States, England, France, Spain, Brazil and other countries to study trade conditions and find new outlets for Belgian products.

Leopold, a Catholic like his father, was carefully educated and trained for his duties as ruler. Queen Astrid is a niece of King Gustav of Sweden. A Protestant at the time of her marriage to Leopold, she has since joined the Catholic church.

FOR the time being the danger of a European war arising from the Austrian Socialist rebellion is over. Great Britain, France and Italy have united to safeguard Austria's independence, and while that holds no other nation dare attack. Long conversations were held in Paris by British Ambassador Lord Tyrrell, Premier Doumergue, Foreign Minister Louis Barthou, Capt. Anthony Eden, British lord privy seal, and representatives of Italy, and the outcome was this statement to the world:

"The Austrian government has inquired of the governments of France, Great Britain and Italy as to their attitude with regard to a dossier which it prepared with a view of establishing German interference in the internal affairs of Austria and communicated to them. The conversations which have taken place between the three governments on this subject have shown they take a common view as to the necessity of maintaining Austria's independence and integrity in accordance with the relevant treaties."

This pronouncement was proposed by Premier Mussolini, who seeks to keep Austria intact as a buffer state between Nazlism and Fascism. It is, of course, directed to Hitler, who hopes that the government of Chancellor Dollfuss may be overthrown, if not by force, then in elections. In that case Hitler believes the Austrian Nazis could gain control of the country and bring about the long cherished idea of a political union with Germany. The recent Socialist rebellion was seen as an aid to the Nazis since the government, in suppressing it and wiping out the Socialist party, did what the Nazis would have had to do in event of their winning. Hitler declared that the Austrian workmen would now rally to the Nazi banner.

Chancellor Dollfuss declares that the number of fatalities in the revolt was greatly exaggerated, and puts it at only 214. Correspondents on the spot still insist that the dead numbered between 1,000 and 1,500, and refugees in Czechoslovakia said at least 2,500 were killed.

CAPT. ANTHONY EDEN is moving from capital to capital in Europe on the rather hopeless mission of reviving the disarmament negotiations. In Paris he was told by the seven big men of the French cabinet that France was unwilling to reduce her military power while the Nazi menace continues, and the French government had already coldly refused to discuss the matter with Hitler "while Germany is rearming." Concessions recently offered to the German chancellor had been met with inconclusive arguments, and with demands for a German army of 300,000 effectives, which France rejected. The most the French statesmen would say was that they "looked forward in a most general manner toward the possibility of an international accord, equally hoped for by both parties on the question of disarmament."

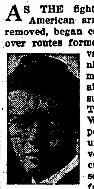
Anthony Eden

Discouraged but persistent, Captain Eden went on to Berlin and Rome for further conversations based on the British plan for reduction of armaments.

THE appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office departments had just slid easily through the senate when Senator Vandenberg hustled into the chamber and demanded and obtained a reconsideration. He comes from Grand Rapids, Mich., where as every one knows a lot of furniture is manufactured; and he was aroused by the fact that the bill as passed contained a provision for the manufacture of furniture and other equipment for the postal service in factories established by the government. Senator McKellar, in charge of the measure, admitted the intent of the provision was government manufacture to begin with the Reedsville (W. Va.) subsistence farm, in which Mrs. Roosevelt is deeply interested.

Mr. Vandenberg and others, including especially Senator J. W. Bailey, Democrat, of North Carolina, argued strenuously against this feature of the bill, denouncing it as socialistic, and when a vote was taken the measure got through by the narrow majority of 34 to 28. Thirteen Democrats were recorded in the negative, but seven Republicans, mostly the "independents," supported the measure.

AS THE fighting planes of the American army, with their guns removed, began carrying the air mail over routes formerly covered by private air line companies, the senate committee investigating air mail contracts resumed its inquiry. The main witness was Walter F. Brown, postmaster general under President Hoover, who has been accused by his successor of collusion and favoritism in the letting of the contracts. Mr. Brown had denied the charges in a long statement and in appearing before the committee he waived the immunity which generally shields a congressional witness from subsequent prosecution.



Colonel Lindbergh

Colonel Lindbergh, more or less involved in the air mail affair, gave to the senate investigators a statement of his aviation profits, as follows:

1. From sale of warrants to purchase stock in the Pan-American Airways, $150,884.80.
2. Salary from Pan-American, $10,000 a year.
3. Salaries of $7,194.45 in 1931 and $6,000 in 1932 and 1933 from Transcontinental and Western Air.
[illegible]om Transcontinental Air Transport (predecessor to Transcontinental and Western Air), $250,000 in cash, reinvested in that company's stock and later sold at a $195,633.75 profit.
5. A $10,000 a year salary as technical adviser to the Pennsylvania railroad for three years and a $1 a year salary since 1931.

Losses: $554.75 from investments in other aviation companies prior to 1930.

L. H. Brittin, former vice president of Northwest Airways, went to jail for ten days for contempt of the senate; and William J. MacCracken, Jr., who received the same sentence, was out on bond pending appeal to the courts.

SECRETARIES ICKES, WALLACE, Dern and Perkins were named by the President as a committee to draw up definite plans for his permanent public works program. This is intended to effect great economic and social changes and will cost probably more than half a billion dollars yearly. Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers take it for granted that even after business has achieved recovery there will be from three to five million persons still unemployed and that they must be cared for by something like the Civil Works administration.

This new project as now conceived includes these major undertakings:

Methodical development of waterways, water power, flood control, soil erosion preventives, reforestation, and other public works. On these works employment would be furnished in the manner of the present CCC and CWA.

Decentralization of industry through establishment of small industries in rural regions to enable people to make a living partly by farming and partly by factory employment. A start in this direction is now being made in the subsistence homesteads, for which twenty-five millions of recovery funds have been allocated.

Government purchase of submarginal lands unfit for cultivation, which would be added to the public domain and devoted to forest development. For this purpose twenty-five millions already have been allotted.

WHY CLUTTER UP LIFE'S JOURNEY WITH QUARRELS?

In his weekly comments, in the Sunday magazine of the Los Angeles Times, on the "Synagogue" he has made famous, John Steven McGroarty makes this splendid contribution to the philosophy of life:

"Every man and woman in the far-flung synagogue throughout the world, and all other men and women who have lived long enough to tell a story, have the same story to tell. It is the story of comrades fallen in the battles of life.

"There is no need of wars to the end that men shall die. They die, anyway. Some die soon and others wait long to die. But, die they must, be it soon or late. If disease does not take them, age will. The summons of the Pale Rider cannot be evaded.

"You will think of this when you count the friends you have known and who have passed from beyond sight and ken. Day by day they fall from the ranks of those who still live and wait, each man for his turn. And life is never again just the same when a comrade falls stricken, no more to be comrade in this world again.

"It is all such a little while for anyone. And so, why is it that there are hate and strife among us? Why do we bicker and quarrel since there is such a short while in which to love and be happy? That's what you will be thinking of if you will go into the closet of your soul and contemplate, with God only for a witness of your thoughts.

"The Wanderer of Galilee taught all this. And it was all that he taught. Which, was, indeed, enough. Just love, and nothing else.

"Man is a harsh man to himself. He is cruel to himself and hard on himself. And, strangely enough, he could change everything for himself by no greater effort than a thought in his heart."

The Family Quilt

When a family preserves records of its history, it is generally done in the family Bible or album, says the Boston Post. But a woman in Sussex, Wis., hit upon a strange family record. She made a quilt of transparent silk. Under the silk pieces she sewed old records, letters and family mementos. The records can be read through the silk and are well preserved.

JUDGE FELLA FINE

English for foreigners is difficult at best, but in the heat of emotion it's almost too much for them. Take the case of this Italian who was hailed before a police magistrate for fighting. In explaining how the fray occurred he said. "Thisa man, shea come to my house place. Shea slamia my door wide open shut and shea calla me evry name what I am and I tella her I'm another. Shea kicka my dog with bigga rocks. Shea calla my wife to go to h—l. I got no scare for nobody. I fight anyone twice my heavy."

The next day in court the Italian inquired for the health of the judge; "How yah fella, jedge?" To which the justice replied, "Fine! $25."

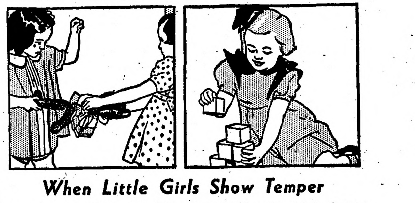
Whose Fault?



When Little Girls Show Temper

A quarrelsome child is a sick child, mothers! A bad bowel condition means bad behavior. And it doesn't help matters to give bilious boys and girls some powerful cathartic that upsets them for days. When you see a coated tongue, dull or yellowed eyes, or other signs of sluggishness, there's always a way to cleanse and sweeten that little system without violence; next day you have a happy, contented child. This common-sense treatment is explained on the right:

Good health and good behavior go hand in hand. With inner health, come smiling faces and sunny dispositions. And it's really so simple a matter to keep children's bowels regular. The only "medicine" most youngsters ever need to promote thorough bowel action is pure California Syrup of Figs. The senna in this fine, fruity laxative never weakens them, or takes away their appetite. But get real California Syrup of Figs; you can get it anywhere; it isn't expensive.

Fish For an Emperor

MONTEZUMA was his name—good old Montezuma, Aztec Emperor of Mexico. Like you and me and everyone else with good taste, Montezuma liked fish, but like other emperors he liked his fish from far-away places, and he didn't care who knew it. Particularly did he like the fish from the Pacific Ocean, which was hundreds and hundreds of miles away from his palace. And unfortunately this was back in the days when they had no modern conveniences to brag about—no canned fish, no automobiles, not even horses.

Simple Service

So here is how Montezuma got his fish course—a simple matter of a hundred men to serve it. In the morning a delegation would catch the fish at Acapulco harbor. A brown runner stood on the beach with his basket ready. The fish was packed in seaweed and put in the basket. The runner then did a marathon toward the hills, and a league farther up another runner waited, relay fashion, to grab the basket and speed along to the next runner. At noon a brown runner was still speeding the fish along. And by evening good old Montezuma had his fried fish for dinner—or some of the chain of brown runners just didn't show up the next morning.

Think of this when you call your grocer on the telephone tomorrow. Speak to him like an emperor and order him to send up a salmon steak from Alaska, crab from Japan, caviar from Russia, or whatever you wish—and issue an order for "heads off" if you're not eating that delicious fish in jig (saw) time.*

BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

From one of the prominent motor vehicle police in an eastern state came the statement that the majority of accidents can be traced to the driver who is violating the law.

With some drivers law observance doesn't seem to mean anything at all. This type must be forced to obey the laws. Education has no effect upon them. Their code is not: "What is the Law?" but "What can I get away with?" It is the latter that the officer, no doubt, refers to and he is right.

We need better law enforcement on our highways. What would happen if our railroads, steamship lines, and other companies were as weak in enforcing safety regulations as some states are in enforcing safety regulations on our highways?

Give the reckless driver his due punishment and enforce the law rigidly.

Warns Against Spring Burning

E. V. Willard, commissioner of conservation, has issued a warning relative to the practice of spring burning. "Wild life, both furred and feathered," the warning says, "suffers an untold loss each year because of forest and praire fires.

"It is a safe estimate," it continues, "that for every acre burned the life of a wild creature went out in fire and smoke. There are many things that might be done towards increasing Minnesota's wild life, but none are as far-reaching or more immediate in effect than that of keeping fire out of fields and forests. Running fires in the spring frequently destroy in a few days more wild life than the hunters bag in a year. To conserve our remaining forests it is imperative that every effort be made to keep out fire."

Fish For an Emperor

MONTEZUMA was his name—good old Montezuma, Aztec Emperor of Mexico. Like you and me and everyone else with good taste, Montezuma liked fish, but like other emperors he liked his fish from far-away places, and he didn't care who knew it. Particularly did he like the fish from the Pacific Ocean, which was hundreds and hundreds of miles away from his palace. And unfortunately this was back in the days when they had no modern conveniences to brag about—no canned fish, no automobiles, not even horses.

Simple Service

So here is how Montezuma got his fish course—a simple matter of a hundred men to serve it. In the morning a delegation would catch the fish at Acapulco harbor. A brown runner stood on the beach with his basket ready. The fish was packed in seaweed and put in the basket. The runner then did a marathon toward the hills, and a league farther up another runner waited, relay fashion, to grab the basket and speed along to the next runner. At noon a brown runner was still speeding the fish along. And by evening good old Montezuma had his fried fish for dinner—or some of the chain of brown runners just didn't show up the next morning.

Think of this when you call your grocer on the telephone tomorrow. Speak to him like an emperor and order him to send up a salmon steak from Alaska, crab from Japan, caviar from Russia, or whatever you wish—and issue an order for "heads off" if you're not eating that delicious fish in jig (saw) time.*

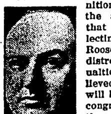
Deaths of Army Pilots Embarrass the Administration—Conflict Between NRA and Ford Renewed—Vote on Veterans' Bonus Forced.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD



J. A. Farley

DEATHS of five army aviators killed in operations connected with the carrying of the air mail have supplied the Republicans with ammunition for attacking the administration that they are not neglecting. President Roosevelt himself is distressed by the casualties, and it is believed his supporters will hasten to offer in congress a bill giving the air mail contracts back to private companies. Postmaster General Farley has had to shoulder the greater share of the blame, if blame there is, and though he has steadily defended the cancellation of the contracts, he probably would be glad to see the army air corps relieved of its new task. There is no question as to the courage and ability of the army flyers, but it is evident they have not had the peculiar training to fit them for carrying the mails, and their airplanes are not suitable for the work. Of course, the weather has been against them, but little attention is paid to that fact by those who are making political capital out of the deaths of the five.

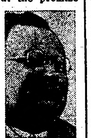
Mr. Farley, appearing before the senate committee investigating air mail affairs, declared that no one deplored the fatalities more than he, but that the Post Office department had felt it must cancel the contracts and had acted on the basis of the law and the conditions under which it found the contracts had been made. He assured the committee that as rapidly as possible the department would work out a new policy in the public interest with respect to the air mail and would take into account the interests of the operators.

The postmaster general had been summoned especially to confront his predecessor, Walter F. Brown, and to consent to Mr. Brown's repeating a remark he said Mr. Farley had made to him about Senator Hugo L. Black, chairman of the committee. This was: "He's just a publicity hound. But don't tell anybody I said so, because I've got to get along with him."

Mr. Farley immediately denied that he had said any such thing, and, scarlet faced, he departed for New York amid roars of laughter. His denial was necessary, doubtless, but it didn't seem to impress anyone.

The grand jury in Washington began the third week of its investigation of army motorization and other contracts.

SENTIMENT in favor of the immediate payment of the veterans' bonus is so strong among the Democrats in the house that the promise of a veto by the President did not deter 145 representatives from signing a petition to take the Patman bill from the committee and bring it up for a vote on March 12. Speaker Rainey had been to the White House and returned with this message:



Wright Patman

"I am authorized by the President to say that this is not the time to pay the bonus and that he cannot approve any legislation to that effect."

But the members went right on signing. Mr. Rainey was visibly disturbed, but said, in reply to inquiries, "We're going to let the house do just as it pleases."

Most of the signers of the petition were green members of the house, and many of them were sorry when they realized what they had done. Now the Democrats will have to go on record. If they vote against the bill, they will offend the veterans; if they vote for it, they will incur the displeasure of the President.

Wright Patman of Texas, Democrat, author of the bill, told the house the measure would provide the administration with the mechanism for carrying out the inflationary program it already has embraced, and that it would save the government billions of dollars in interest. It seemed most likely that the bill would be passed by the house, and it may also get through the senate, for the sentiment for it has been steadily growing in that body.

As a forecast of what it might do with the bonus bill, the senate, disregarding the President's wishes, passed by a vote of 51 to 30 the amendment to restore to Spanish-American war veterans 90 per cent of their former pensions. Eighteen Democrats voted aye. At the same time the President renewed his threat of a veto in a letter to Speaker Rainey.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT in a special message asked congress to create a new federal commission to regulate the wire, cable and radio communications systems. He proposed that the new commission take over the duties of the federal radio commission and the functions of the Interstate Commerce commission which deal with telegraph and telephone regulation.

Mr. Roosevelt said the new body should be given "full power to investigate and study the business of existing companies and make recommendations to the congress for additional legislation at the next session."

This means that if the President's desires are carried out, as they undoubtedly will be, the question of communications mergers will go over for determination next year.

IN RESPONSE to a resolution adopted last spring, the federal trade commission submitted to the senate a compilation of the salaries paid to the officers of 877 corporations from 1928 to 1933, together with the total assets of the companies and their net income or loss during those years. The report filled more than a dozen thick volumes.

Among the corporations failing to report the salaries were General Motors, Studebaker, American Can and General Aviation. These challenged the right of the commission and senate to demand the data.

THREE export-import banks are to be set up to help American exporters to finance shipments abroad, and George N. Peek announced, after a White House conference, that he would be the head of these institutions. The banks will all be owned by the government. One will deal with Russian business, one with Cuban, and the third with credits for all other foreign countries.

NRA and the Ford Motor company are tangling up in another fight. The company was charged by workers with having refused to bargain collectively with their representatives at the Edgewater, N. J., and Chester, Pa., plants, and William H. Davis, national compliance director, arranged to hear the arguments of both sides at a meeting in Washington. Secretary Craig of the Ford company sent Davis a long letter denying the concern had violated any provision of the automobile code or the national recovery act, and refusing to send a representative to the meeting. The NRA thereupon notified President Edsel Ford that it would investigate the charges "without his co-operation."

Henry Ford

The automobile industry was disturbed by widespread labor troubles and the threat of a general walkout. Difficulties over union organization and demands for pay increases are at the bottom of all the row. There were strikes in two centers of the industry in Michigan, and thousands of workers were awaiting the decision of President William Green of the American Federation of Labor before taking action on requests for a general strike. This request came from a meeting in Toledo of 5,000 members of the Automobile Workers' union, the machinists' union and the union of blacksmiths and drop forgers.

SENATOR BULKLEY of Ohio told correspondents in Washington that President Roosevelt soon will break another precedent and appoint a woman to the Federal Court of Appeals. His choice, according to the senator, will be Judge Florence E. Allen of Ohio, now the country's only state Supreme court justice; she will be elevated to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals whose district comprises Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee.

The senator also announced the Chief Executive had agreed to nominate another woman, Mrs. Bernice S. Pyke of Cleveland, for collector of customs for Ohio at Cleveland.

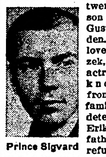
DARTMOUTH college, at Hanover, N. H., was thrown into mourning by the worst tragedy in its history. Nine students, members of Theta Chi fraternity, were killed by carbon monoxide gas as they slept in the fraternity house. An explosion had disconnected a furnace chimney pipe and the deadly fumes had spread through the building. The victims were W. S. Fullerton of Cleveland Heights, Ohio; E. F. and A. H. Moldenke of New York; W. M. Smith of Manhassett, N. Y.; E. M. Wentworth of Chicago; Americo De Masi of Little Neck, N. Y.; H. B. Watson of Wilton, Maine; W. H. Schooley of Middleton, N. Y., and J. J. Griffin of Wallingford, Conn.

SEVEN men and a woman perished in a tragedy of the air in Utah. A United Air liner on its way from Salt Lake City to Cheyenne, Wyo., was caught in a snowstorm and struck a mountain side not far from the Utah capital. After three days' search the wreckage and the bodies of the victims were found. Five passengers, two pilots and the stewardess had been killed instantly.

THROUGH the central parts of Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi swept an unseasonable tornado, killing about two dozen persons and leaving a trail of devastation. The Red Cross, as always, was quick to carry relief to the stricken region.

UNDER the management of Gen. Hugh Johnson, the NRA opened a series of public hearings in Washington, open to all individuals and organizations that wanted to present suggestions or complaints concerning policies or administration of the NRA codes. The possible benefits from such hearings appeared to be lessened by the restrictions decreed by General Johnson. He ruled that all speakers should be considered as "witnesses"; that only facts might be presented, and that no argument would be permitted. It was expected that thousands of persons would attend the meetings, and other thousands the next sessions scheduled for March 5.

EVEN in a republic the people like to read about the doings of royalty, so there has been much interest in the romance of Prince Sigvard, twenty-six-year-old son of Crown Prince Gustav Adolf of Sweden. Sigvard fell in love with Erika Patzek, a German film actress who is little known and comes from a middle class family. The prince was determined to marry Erika but his grandfather, King Gustav, refused his consent and told Sigvard he would be disowned if he persisted in his plan. Nevertheless the young man, unable to get the necessary papers in Berlin, went to London with Erika and it was reported the wedding would take place there on March 8.



Prince Sigvard

The prince is well aware that if he marries the German girl he will forfeit his royal rights and thenceforth will be just "Mr. Bernadotte," but he apparently is ready to give up everything for love. In 1932 his cousin, Prince Lennert, married the daughter of a Stockholm industrialist and is now known as Mr. Lennert Bernadotte.

ENGLAND is proverbially lenient with agitators of all kinds, but when thousands of unemployed from all parts of the country marched into London and were reinforced by other thousands of the idle in the metropolis and hordes of Communists, the police took steps to prevent dangerous outbreaks. The throng held meetings in Hyde Park and 3,000 Scotland Yard men were on hand to keep them curbed, while the entire police force was mobilized at its stations. At first only two men were arrested, for making seditious speeches. They were Tom Mann, veteran Communist, and Harry Pillitt, of the same ilk. An icy rain helped the authorities to preserve order during the great mass meetings in the park, but serious trouble was anticipated late in the week.

The demonstrators wanted to call on Prime Minister MacDonald, but he refused to receive them, explaining that the house of commons was handling the unemployment situation. The marchers were protesting against the condition of the unemployed generally and also against certain features of the bill before parliament. Their orators attacked members of the royal family but were careful not to mention the king.

IF JAPAN and Russia do not get into a war, it will be the fault of neither. The latest development in their growing hostility is a row over fishing rights in the north Pacific. The Japanese government is enraged because Moscow has doubled the ruble rate of exchange with the yen and has rejected Japanese bids on the Kamchatka fishing grounds based on the old rate. This, the Tokyo foreign office says, is a flagrant violation of a solemn agreement between Baron Shidehara, former foreign minister, and Alexander Troyanovsky, former Soviet ambassador to Japan.

FRANCE was stirred by a mystery murder that is connected with the $60,000,000 Stavisky scandal. Albert Prince, counselor of the Court of Appeals and the key witness in the Stavisky case, was lured from Paris and slain and his body was tied to a railroad track near Dijon and mangled by the train.

In the same connection, the Paris police announced they had discovered evidence that Stavisky was an international spy as well as a swindler; that he was aided by a number of women, and probably had sold valuable information to the German government.

JOHN J. McGRAW, grand old man of baseball and manager of the New York Giants for more than thirty years until his retirement in June, 1932, died in the hospital at New Rochelle, N. Y., of uremia complicated with other disorders. He was nearly sixty-one years of age and had been in poor health for more than a year. Under his management the Giants won ten pennants, his record being approached only by that of Connie Mack of the Athletics.

OFFICIALS of St. Paul and Minneapolis were considerably angered by a statement made by Attorney General Homer S. Cummings in which he said the Twin cities were "breeding grounds of crime." Mayor Mahoney of St. Paul telegraphed to Mr. Cummings demanding that he amplify his charges, but the attorney general's only reply was to say that he meant what he said. Thereupon the mayor gave the Ramsey county attorney a list of twelve persons, including Mr. Cummings, whom he wished asked to appear before the grand jury, which is now in session. It was said legal complications probably would prevent the subpoenaing of Mr. Cummings.

Poorhouse Author Misbehaving A Big Man's Family

© Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

By ED HOWE

I HAVE received an unusual letter from a man I do not know, and who lives in a distant state. He says: "You once wrote that a book entitled 'The Autobiography of a Failure' might meet public favor. I enclose an attempt at such writing, and, as a preliminary, tell you my qualifications. I spent ten years in an insane asylum, but was never discharged as cured. At present I am in a poorhouse, and half blind, in addition to being somewhat palsied and rheumatic. I am sixty-four years old, and have never married. My manuscript was typed by another inmate of the poorhouse where I live."

Probably no editor would consider this writing for publication, as it is carelessly written and arranged, but I believe any of them would read it, as I did. Curiously enough, this author is conservative, and quotes with approval some of the most noted writers of history who have denounced radicalism. He grumbles at the rich a good deal, but admits the ordinary facts of life with considerable intelligence.

Altogether, I do not believe this man is insane, or ever has been; he displays, indeed, more than average sense in his thinking. I think his trouble is failure to properly manage his mind and his body, which is the fault of millions of other unfortunates. I have not been more interested in a writer in many years. At times he is almost brilliant in his observations; nowhere is he vulgar or foolish, but frequently commonplace, as all are outside or inside of poor houses or insane asylums.

In the unexpurgated edition of the Memoirs is printed a letter Silerius once wrote. Apparently the correspondent had written that he was handicapped in life because of his having been divorced, of his drinking a good deal, and being known as an atheist. In his reply Silerius said: "I have been divorced twice, but, long after I am as well thought of by my neighbors as either of the women I divorced; and both are good women. I am an atheist, but neither has that injured me. I have experimented freely with liquor, and solved the problem by quitting both drinking and talking about the subject. I do not believe you state your real problem in writing to me. Mine has always been to better manage my own mind and body, and thus gain the respect of those with whom I associate in small and great things."

* * *

There is argument as to whether my preaching is sound. I wish it to be, and to say I am occasionally commended. A man thirty-five years old recently wrote me: "I have liked your articles for some years, but the finest, most beneficial sermon that ever reached me (and my father was a clergyman) was printed lately. You said: 'The ambition to behave, soundly based on the selfish (not noble) knowledge that it is finally the best and easiest way, will supply all the human service a human can hope for' . . . I think I now understand what you have tried so well to make plain, to-wit: that actually it is a stubborn fact, counting the after costs in conscience, disrupted plans, shocked nerves, time lost forever, and injury to others, good behavior is easier than misbehavior. I thank you, sir, for help in my weak endeavor to become a better man."

* * *

A noted Big Man lately appeared at an airport with his wife, a son of fourteen and a daughter of seventeen. The Big Man was rushing from one important duty to another, and chafing at the delay of forty minutes, when a reporter found him. The Big Man loved publicity, and talked freely. He had enormous ideas, very much better than professional writers put into books and magazines. But members of his family were tired of his talk. "Start fanning," said the impudent boy; "dad's turned on the hot air." The wife and daughter expressed almost equal impudence and disapproval of the Big Man's talk. . . . I recall that, when a child, we were all very tired of my father's talk, we heard it so much, and it was always the same. But we were poor people; I had supposed that Big Men talk so wisely that members of their own families listen with awe and interest. It seems they do not.

* * *

We are commanded to love all alike, including our enemies, but I often sin, and confess I have favorites. Some people annoy me so much and unnecessarily I cannot love them; a few others treat me well, and I specially like them. . . . And I think I'm right about it; I do not believe the command that I love my enemies as well as my friends had any great authority back of it.

* * *

Every morning I feel fine and energetic and determined to do a lot that day on the Great Book I am engaged in writing. . . . But after looking over the mail, scribbling a few things of no importance, and attending to the usual complications that arise in a life between seven and ten o'clock of a usual morning, I am worn out, and put it off again until tomorrow.

* * *

I hate to be imposed on, and there is no use trying to argue me out of it. I should have a nobler disposition, but I haven't, and am unable to acquire it.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft.

"But it is! It's more money than I'd ever hoped to have at one time. It was enough to give me a start at something. Oh, I've got to tell it all to you, Jim, or I'll go crazy!" This was so odd that Stevie just had to get his face up so he could see. "I could keep on bein' just a clerk for you, or for some other camp, and bringin' my boy up in the bush where he'd never have a chance. Since Molly died there's been nobody to look after him and it got me. That's no excuse. I won't give Stevie as an excuse for bein' a thief, Jim. It's just"—he made a helpless gesture with one hand—"just that I ain't made the grade and want to do things for him. . . . I never stopped to think he might find out I was a thief some time."

The stillness which followed was so constrained that it impressed even the little boy.

"I'm going to take that thousand away from you, Drake," Jim said slowly. "It ain't what I come after. I trailed you because I knew you didn't respect the weather as a man should, packin' a little codger. But now I'm goin' to take that thousand. It wouldn't be fair to Stevie, not to, even if I didn't need it. I got kids of my own, Drake, young Jim and Katie. It ain't fair to your kids to do anything but stay honest."

But by then the place was getting really warm and after one has been cold for so long and is so comfortable, how, eyes will get heavy, no matter what your father and a boss as important as Jim Flynn are saying. . . . The voice close to the boy rumbled on, growing sterner as the child slept, but never becoming unkindly; just talking from the heart, as a strong and tolerant man will to a weaker.

A far-sighted man, this Jim. He had even brought bread and bacon and after the boy had slept a long time they broiled strips of bacon on sticks and ate bread and prepared for a night of waiting out the storm.

When it lifted the Drakes went on down the river through a world of blinding white, leaving Flynn to return to camp, and now and again as he trudged along the man would say:

"He's so good he ain't human, Stevie! . . . He's saved you more than you'll ever know, he has. He's even given us a job outside where there'll be nobody to know and plague you about bein' . . . bein' my son. Oh, we've got to do something for Jim some time, you and I. . . ."

He said that over and over: that the Drakes would have to do something for Jim. And all through the years that followed he said it until the obligation was indelibly stamped on Steve Drake's consciousness.

Swiftly, the boy grew up, maturing as those will who are forced not only to fight their own battles but to fight for those who should, by all natural law, be their protectors. Early in life he came to regard his father as a pathetic figure, to shield him, to do his level best to bolster the man's insufficient courage. He accepted the responsibility without protest. When a man's father is a weakling and has no one on earth but his son, what else is there to do?

They never saw Jim Flynn again. He had finished his job on the north shore of Superior and went to operate elsewhere. Now and again they heard of him, though, and frequently talked of him.

Always, at such times, the elder Drake would say:

"If we ever get the chance, Stevie . . ."

"You bet!" his growing son would agree. "If we ever get the chance we'll bust ourselves wide open to do something for old Jim."

CHAPTER II

Two decades, then; two decades and a bit more since that day when Jim Flynn's body brought comfort back to tender flesh, and now it was a tall, bronzed Steve Drake who loafed into that jewel of a lake, paddle across his knees.

"Gee!" he breathed. "A new world . . . a new life coming!"

He dipped his paddle and smiled somberly.

A new world; new in freshness, surely; a new part of the world to Steve, too. And a new life was opening before him, he felt. Behind—in the years—were many things: a handicapped boyhood, a duty well done, a father who was now only a memory and a disaster marked up as the net result of the first business enterprise he had tackled.

He was cleaned out; after his men had been paid not a dollar had remained. He had not even been able to buy himself a new outfit to start this rather aimless journey. Cleaned out, yes, but he owed no man, he had learned many things and was still young. He was just drifting through the country, vaguely headed for some other territory than that which had rendered him ill fortune, alert for whatever might turn up; perhaps a little impatient for action, now that he had had a fortnight of solitude to muster his scattered forces.

He rounded a jutting point and stopped paddling abruptly, for beyond him he saw a tent and a group of men.

They came down to the water's edge and one called out:

"Hi, chum, comin' ashore?"

"Hadn't figured on it."

He was close enough to see that this obviously was a party of city men and a guide. It was the guide, a short, wiry man, who had hailed.

"Have you got any extra salt?"

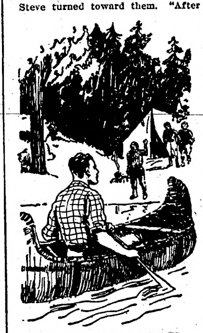
"A little. Need some?"

"Yes, we're—"

"Need some?" another broke in. "Need it? Ever been out of salt for three days? Say, I wanna know, have you?"

Clearly this speaker, a tall, handsome youth, was well on his way toward drunkenness.

Steve turned toward them. "After three days you should be used to it," he remarked, grinning.



"Hi, Chum, Comin' Ashore!"

"Where'd you get that You stuff? Who'n h—l wants to not notice it? Say, buddy, you just show us some salt and name the price!"

Steve let the canoe beach gently.

"If it'll help you any, I'll split," he said, rising.

They gathered close with an eagerness which was good evidence of their salt hunger. Steve opened his torn and weather-rotted pack-sack and drew out a tin can.

"There. Help yourselves."

"What's it worth?" the chief spokesman demanded. "Name a price, old party! We're rotten rich so long's th' jack holds out."

"Take what you want; that's all right."

"A' right, h—l! How much you want for half thish?"

Steve laughed them away, telling the insistent purchaser to help himself, and the three, bearing the salt can as if it were a great treasure, walked up the rise toward the tent. The guide and Drake exchanged significant glances.

"Idle rich?" Steve asked.

"Idle, anyhow. Thrun a fit 'cause th' flapjacks didn't have salt. Beats h—l how folks gits pampered. Better come up and dry."

Steve decided that he might as well. He had just gotten himself stripped and was wringing out his shirt when the drunken lad emerged from the tent.

"Now, say, buddy, what we owe you?" he demanded. "Nothin'? Th' h—l we don't! That salt's worth its weight in gold, 'nd a whole lot more."

Drake again protested and his firmness balked the other who began to nod with narrowed eyes, returned to the tent and reappeared with a bottle of whisky and a clean pack-sack.

"Now, first you gotta have a drink, fella. Then, from looks your pack-sack, you could use 'nother. Take thish. It's extra. Not been used once. Small token our 'ppreciation."

Steve looked at the pack. It was of white duck, stoutly made. On the flap, initials and a star were branded in black.

"Why, that thing's worth a barrel of salt! I can't take it."

"Try 'nd not, then! Just you try 'nd not take it, party, 'nd get your dam' block knocked loose."

The guide, though grinning, nodded emphatically to Steve.

"All right. Fine of you. Thanks."

"Now fer a li'l drink."

Drake took the bottle, saluted and touched it to his lips.

"G'wan! Take a drink, man!"

"Thanks, that's plenty. I'm reasonably well caught up in my year's drinking."

The other grinned.

"Lucky party. We ain't. Secret, but a fact. We're away behin'. . . . Way behin'. . . ."

He drank lingeringly and then, apparently dismissing the guest from his mind, turned back to the tent.

"Better take the sack," the guide said with a chuckle. "Save trouble. He sure's generous 'nd gets pretty hot when he don't have his way when he's tight. Know who he is?"—cautiously.

"No; this is new country to me."

"Ever hear of th' Jim Flynns, old 'nd young?"

Steve, wringing out a pants leg, relaxed the tension and gave a startled: "Huh?"

"Sure you have. Well, that's Old Jim's get: Young Jim Flynn."

"Well, I'll be d—d!"

"Yeah. So will he, likely, if his dad ever gets up. Dam' shame, y' know, for a young feller to carry on like he does. He's supposed to be down at Good-Bye, where the Flynns are in trouble. Thorpe, who was runnin' the job, died a month ago. Old Jim got jammed up and his daughter maybe lost her eyes in an accident when the old man was goin' to a train to start up here. Smashed his hip and he's out for months, the kid says.

"Old McNally's the best thing for a boss they've got and he's no good, job's all gone to h—l and they send this kid up to keep her goin'. Does he show up at Good-Bye? He does not! He comes north of it, brings these-here bloodsuckers with him, hires me 'nd seems like he plans to spend the summer drinkin'."

"Well, I'm d—d!" said Steve again, old memories surging in him. So this was Old Jim's son!

"What's this about the Flynn job gone haywire?" he asked sharply.

The guide shrugged. "I dunno much. It's a scrap amongst th' big guns, I guess; either that, or a lot of bad luck comin' to Old Jim, which it does now 'nd then to lots of loggers. He's cleaned out down below, they say. Lost two mills and a good many years cut on a mortgage. All he's got now's the Good-Bye stuff.

"It's fine hardwood and if he can get swingin' in time he'll prob'ly make a go of it. There's some swamp stuff and this spring he put in a pulpwood camp 'nd they're drivin' it down th' river. Same time, he starts puttin' in his railroad, plannin' to put up a mill in Shoestring 'nd run next winter, but when I went in for booze for these dudes last week I heerd a fellar named Franz had his right-of-way sewed up. That is, they say it was Franz, but I know him 'nd know he never had a dime of his own. More 'n likely he's just doin' the dirty work for the Bensons, who own the land up to Old Jim and who'd like to get their paws on his Good-Bye stuff. There's some talk of Flynn's backers sayin' that if he can't get operatin' this fall they're done with him. Tough!"

"That is tough!" Steve muttered. "When the kid's sober, is he any good?"

The guide shrugged again.

"Can't prove it by me. He's never been in this country before; Old Jim's kept him pretty close. Likely he don't count much on him. He's two weeks overdue at Good-Bye, now. He's been with me, drunk every day. Looks like he'd be here until his money plays out, and he's got quite a roll."

"Well!" Steve began pulling on his damp shirt. Old Jim Flynn in a pinch! And physically helpless and financially handicapped. This, while he had been reared to believe that to render service to Jim Flynn, should opportunity arise, was the first obligation!

"How do you get across to the Good-Bye?" he asked.

"Well, it's a long drag; a long, hard day. You start here . . ." And with a twig he scratched a crude map in the sand.

"Having a pack-sack that'll hold something'll be a help on the carries," Drake remarked when he had the lay of the land in his head.

"You goin' that way?"

"Likely."

"Well, if you see McNally, better not mention anything about Young Jim bein' here. He's got to be handled careful, this kid. I'll taper him off and get him on his feet when he's had his belly full of bender."

Steve frowned as he paddled. It was not pleasant to think of how Old Jim had warmed him with the warmth of his own body, and how generous the man had been with his weakling father, and then to think of him as he was now, scotched and broken. . . .

What he could accomplish by going to Good-Bye he did not know and he laughed at himself when he considered that. For such as he to think of aiding a figure of Jim Flynn's proportion in the forest industries was like a mouse setting out to help a lion. . . . His self-conscious smile died when he thought of the old fable. Once upon a time, anyhow, a mouse gave aid to a lion. . . .

He came to a small clearing beside the river. On a bench built of saplings stood a nest of buckets, two hand water pumpers, axes and shovels. Above was a sign, faded black on a white background:

"POLARIS FOREST PRODUCTS CO.
FIRE TOOL CACHE."

And on the corners was stenciled the same five-pointed, black star which branded the flap of his new pack-sack.

However, he saw no evidence of woods operations for some time. He threaded an old beaver meadow and after a short interval the thick stands of swamp timber opened to reveal browned slash with pulp bolts ranked in piles through it. Buildings were there, too, but although it was the supper hour no smoke ascended from their stovepipe chimneys. A dog barked and another joined, and in the doorway of a tar-paper shanty a man appeared. Steve shoved his canoe against the bark littered dump and waited as the man came toward him, hobbling on crutches fashioned from birch saplings, and one foot, wrapped in many yards of soiled rags, was held gingerly forward.

Woodchuck an Animal That Has Few Friends

The West has the prairie dog; the East the woodchuck, or groundhog, and there is no affection wasted on either one by the hunter or farmer. Of all ground rodents the woodchuck is considered the greatest nuisance and one that frequently causes considerable property and personal damage. Unlike many other forms of so called predatory or noxious animals, the woodchuck is one that has never been protected by any state; usually it carries a price on its head in the form of a bounty. Foxes, wildcats, squirrels, skunks and other roving, marauding wild creatures at some time or other have enjoyed the protection of man-made laws, but the woodchuck never.

Of late years woodchucks have shown a tendency to increase throughout the rural districts of Michigan, says the Detroit News, and it is now believed that they are at their peak with us. The same holds true of the New England states, New York, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. This undoubtedly has come about through the wide abandonment of farms or the failure of farm owners to cultivate crops as extensively as they did five years ago. The woodchuck is a farm-loving animal and is especially fond of areas over which forage crops, such as clover, alfalfa and timothy have been planted.

MEDICAL ADVICE

If you want to

- . . . relieve constipation gently and safely
- . . . take the exact dose suited to your need
- . . . avoid danger of bowel strain

—use a liquid laxative

Can constipation be safely relieved? "Yes!" say medical men. "Yes!" declare thousands who have followed their advice and know.

You are not apt to cure your constipation with salts, pills and tablets, or any habit-forming cathartic. But you can safely relieve this condition just by gentle regulation with a suitable liquid laxative.

Why Hospitals use a liquid laxative

The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be regulated to suit your individual need. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will it irritate the kidneys.

The right liquid laxative will bring a perfect movement, with no discomfort at the time, or afterward.

The unwise use of strong cathartics may often do more harm than good.

In buying any laxative, read the label. If it contains a doubtful drug, don't take it. If you don't know what is in it, don't chance it. The contents of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is stated plainly on the label; fresh herbs, pure pepsin, active senna.

Its very taste tells you Syrup Pepsin is wholesome. A delightful taste, and delightful action. Safe for expectant mothers, and children. Drug stores have it, ready for use, in big bottles.

THE TEST:

This test has proved to many men and women that their trouble was not "weak bowels," but strong cathartics!

First: select a properly prepared liquid laxative. Second: take the dose you find suited to your system. Third: gradually reduce the dose until bowels are moving of their own accord

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin has the highest standing among liquid laxatives, and is the one generally used.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

The safe driver seldom finds himself in the police court or in the hospital. He is never in trouble. He always obeys the law. Here are just a few of the accidents that he has no trouble in avoiding:

1. Crashing into the car ahead. (He keeps back at a safe distance with his car under perfect control.)
2. Rear end collissions. (He uses his rear view mirror and signals promptly and intelligently.)
3. Hill or curve accidents. (He takes no chances whatever when he cannot see the road ahead clearly.)
4. Grade crossing accidents. (He will under no circumstances cross the railroad tracks until he is absolutely certain that it is safe to do so.

That's just common sense. That's all safety is, too.

Antiques

A chair whose back was worn and old,
Was to an antique dealer sold.
The dealer smiled and wrinkled
his brow,
A nice sum I'll make on this
I 'low
So he took a hammer, nails, and glue,
A brush, sandpaper, and some varnish, too.
Next week what should stand in his window but,
A beatiful old chair of black walnut,
That dated back to Elizabeth's reign
When pirates sailed the Spanish
Main
Then along came the very man who sold it,
He stopped and exclaimed,
"What a pretty bit
Of furniture that is. I'll surprise my wife and buy it."

ERIN GO BRAGH!

ST. PATRICK, as the patron saint of going to school, may not appeal very strongly to small scholars of today. But green shamrocks, white clay pipes, and little pink toy pigs are three memorials of him that make the seventeenth of March popular with children everywhere. And when you add a potato hunt and refreshments gay as a jig, you have the start of a St. Patrick's Day party that is sure to be the top of the afternoon.

Begin your party with invitations written on green cardboard shamrocks or pale pink paper pigs with green ribbons tied around their necks. Have these invitations read:

*"Come all ye lads from far and near!
Come every gay Colleen!
For good St. Pat we'll dance a jig A'wearin' of the green."*

*Friday afternoon Three o'clock
Come to John Bray's house
5 Eastwood Street*

As soon as the young guests arrive, present each boy with a necktie made of green crepe paper and every girl with a colleen's head dress, a green mob cap or two green rosettes connected by a narrow band of wired green ribbon.

Spuds and Clay Pipes

The first thing on the program is a potato hunt. For this you need small well-scrubbed potatoes. They may be hidden exactly as you hide Easter eggs. To make the hunt more exciting, scoop out a few larger potatoes, put in them tiny trinkets wrapped in paper, and tie or glue the tops back on them. Give prizes for the largest collection of potatoes, the biggest potato, the smallest one, and for "the ould man," a funny humpy potato with a face marked on it.

*Sliced Chicken Sandwiches
Whole Wheat Nut and Date Bread Sandwiches
Chopped Celery, Raw Carrot, and Peanut Butter Sandwiches
Cream Cheese and Apricot Jam Sandwiches
Cocoa with Marshmallows
Irish Punch
Banana Ice Cream with Animal Crackers Iced in Green
Lime Stick Candy
Dates Stuffed with Green Gum Drops*

If the children are old enough you can make the potatoes into race horses and hold an Irish Sweepstakes. Write names like "Danny," "Brian Boru," "Dublin Boy," "Pride of Cork" and "Galway Gossoon" on slips of paper and attach one with a pin to each potato. Each child chooses a "horse," which he moves ahead by inches, according to the throws of a dice. For a large group of children, you can have as many as four or five different race courses, with four children assigned to each one.

If the children are too small for this exciting game, give each one a clay pipe and let him do honor to all the "little people" of Ireland by blowing soap bubbles as fragile and rainbow-tinted as an Irish fairy's wings.

Good Green Foods

Jigs, reels, and [illegible] "intirely" on St. Patrick's Day. And then come the [illegible] on a table all green and gold. Cut the sandwiches in the shape of shamrocks, pipes and pigs. Wrap some square ones in green paper, and have some open-faced round ones spread with cream cheese colored pale green, with a green maraschino shamrock in the center.

In the box is a party menu and here are tested recipes for wholesome foods "all greened up" for the greenest day of the year.

Whole Wheat Nut and Date Bread: Sift together one and a half cups white flour, six teaspoons baking powder and one and a half teaspoons salt. Add a cup and a half of whole wheat flour. Add three-quarters of a cup of chopped vacuum packed nuts and one cup chopped dates, and mix with your finger-tips until pieces are well covered with flour. Add two-thirds of a cup brown sugar and two beaten eggs. Add one 6-ounce can of evaporated milk mixed with enough water to make a cup and a half. Pour into well-greased loaf pans, one very large, or two medium which is better. Bake in an oven at 325 degrees for about forty-five minutes (a little longer if you use one loaf pan). Two medium loaves will cut into about twenty slices, each.

Banana Ice Cream: Mix three cans condensed milk with one and a half cups water, and add one tablespoon vanilla. Add three cups mashed banana pulp. Add three tablespoons lemon juice and three cups of cream, well beaten. Freeze in refrigerator trays or in ice cream freezer. Serve with an iced animal cracker, preferably a pig, standing on top. This serves twenty-four.*

$60,000 Allotted This County

The state allottment board announces its 1934 distibution of funds.

Marshall County will receive $60,185.00 as its 1934 share of the state one-mill road tax and gasoline tax. This was decided at the annual meeting of the State Board of allotment in St. Paul to apportion the state road and bridge fund, says a Highway Department bulletin.

From the one-mill tax, Marshall county will get $10,185.00, while its share of the gasoline tax will amount to $50,000.00.

The entire proceeds of the one-mill tax go to state aid roads, while one-third of the total gas tax collections go to county aid roads and two-thirds to state trunk highway.

The total amount to be distributed from the State Road and Bridge fund this year will be considerably less than in 1932, owing to an estimated average tax delinquency of 25 per cent and a decreased consumption of gasoline in the state. The Board of Allotment placed the total available this year from the one-mill levy at $1,018,530 compared with $1,291,000 last year. The 1934 share of the counties in the gasoline tax was estimated at $3,200,000 by the board, as against $3,600,000 in 1933.

Members of the board of allotment are N. W. Elsberg, commissioner of highways; Stafford King, state auditor, and state treasurer.

The law fixes the minimum allotment of gas tax funds to any county at ¼ of one per cent of the total amount available, while the minimum allotment to any one county from the one-mill tax is 1 per cent. The maximum allotment to any county is 3 per cent of each fund. Hennepin, Ramsey and St. Louis counties received the maximum permitted by law. Gas tax funds are distributed to the counties in August and February each year. One-mill funds are paid out on state aid roads as completed projects are approved by the State Highway department.

Nature

In the woods, stands a tree
Nodding to you, nodding to me.
Under the tree sits a squirrel

Where I sit and read my book
The song of birds fill the air
Nothing with nature can

RIGHT ROAD

The young couple were making their first long motor trip. They were driving to Chicago. They had blown out two tires, ruined their clothes in a sudden rainstorm, paid $10 to be pulled out of the mud and then had lost their way. The husband got out with a flashlight to inspect a signboard.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, giving Drake another chance, and the father, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spreed. Learning of Polaris' dire straits, and hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters.

—3—

"Bon jour!" the man called.

"Hullo, Louie! This Jim Flynn's?"

"Oui! Oui! Jeem Flynn. Yah. Sure!"

"How far to headquarters?"

"Oh, man say mile-two Beeg point. Beeg point mile-two odder side by head lac. Head lac mile-two more from here by rock dam. Rock dam, she mile-two by here if go ve-ry fast. Oui!"

Steve grinned.

"Let's see, now. You put together enough mile-two's and it'll make a long drag. Try this: How long'll it take me, Louie?"

"Ah! 'ow long by here, eh? Da's bettair, sure! Maak from me better talk, 'ow long, eh? I tell you, mistair yo'ng man, if she go by woods, she not so ve-ry dam' long; if she go by revair an' she come ve'ry fas', you mabby maak headquart' bye-'n'-bye aftair dark, eh?"

"Where's everybody? Just you and the dogs in camp?"

"Oui! Bye-'n'-bye all mans she go headquart'. Two, t'ree half-hour ago. All mans get mad for h—l so go by headquart'."

"Mad, eh? What's the row?"

"I tell you, meestair yo'ng man: we poor work mans; we chop, saw, all tam, all day; maak tree go fall, maak work lak h—l. Meestair Thorpe he die jus' almos' we work mans we ask heem more money. Meestair Yo'ng Jeem, she no come by Good-Bye. We say, McNally, you pay more money. Oui! You pay more money all-same odder work mans odder jobs maak. McNally, he say not'ings! She keep say not'ings. We all go; good, firs'-class work mans an' say tonight, McNally da's no good. We got for have more money sure t'ing! We maak more money tomorrow or we quit. What Jeem Flynn do when work mans quit, eh?"

He beamed. Steve, however, frowned. The manner of the Frenchman's recital presented a phase of humor, yes, but the situation which it revealed, coupled with what he had learned from the guide that forenoon, was not a light one.

"Do I get it straight: you boys are going to quit unless you get more money right away?"

"Oui! Oui! Da's right, meestair yo'ng man!"—in high delight at having conveyed complete understanding.

"I see. . . . Hum-m-m. . . . Well, so long, Louie!"

Steve started down-stream with no further delay. Night was falling and as the canoe entered the broad reaches of Good-Bye lake the first stars set their reflections in its placid surface. Far beyond him faint yellow lights showed and he reasoned that they must be in the windows of headquarters buildings.

Within an hour his canoe grated to rest on a sandy beach. Steve pulled it out, turned the craft over and slipping one arm through a strap of his pack looked about. Several buildings lined the shore and from the largest came a smear of light. The shadows of men moved against this and in the silence the sound of a voice, lifted in sustained and rapid talk, could be heard.

Drake walked forward. This was a store building, the van. Men lined one wall and lounged against the rough counter. They were rough men, in the clothing of woods laborers. They stood listening intently to the short, stocky one who stood in the center confronting another who with arms folded chewed slowly, eyeing the speaker with a harried look.

"That's the story, McNally," the stocky man said as if summing up. "It's more money right away or we'll hit the grade. We put it up to Thorpe and he stalled us. Then, because he died, we hung on waitin' for Young Jim to show up.

"Well, Young Jim ain't showed. You're the only one who has any say around here. We get it from Franz that the Mid-Western folks are payin' another quarter a cord and if they are, Polaris can, or else get along without this crew."

The one addressed as McNally, on the mention of the name Franz, turned an irate glare toward a tall, strapping young man who sat on the counter, one knee clasped in his great hands.

"I got no authority, Wartin," McNally made answer, "to do anything excepten what I'm doin'. If you boys quit, it puts Old Jim right in a hole. It ain't any secret that this pulp operation's all that's keepin' his chin above water. Should it stop, he'd sink; be busted wide open. A lot of you've worked for him for years; you've found him fair and square and willin' to do a bit more 'n anybody else does in the way of pay.

"As for what Mid-Western pays,"—glancing again at Franz in open dislike—"seems to me it's funny you'll take for truth what's said about an outfit that's a hundred miles away. Looks funny to me!"

Franz let his lips twist into a queer smile.

"But that's all I can tell you: I got no right to give you more and that I think it's a dam' shame that you'll threaten to hit a man who's down on his back in more ways than one!"

"But we've waited," Wartin protested, as if on the defensive. "We've waited for Young Jim to come. Don't you see, Mac, that we've done our part?"

He spread his hands as if in appeal for understanding and at that Franz swung himself to the floor and spoke. "I'm only an outsider in this deal," he said, looking hard at McNally, "but since I've been dragged into it I might as well speak my piece. Anyhow, I'm going to do it!"—nodding defiantly at McNally whose face bore a look of helpless anger.

"What's been said about Old Jim Flynn and its being too bad he's smashed up is all true enough. But there's another side to this: the men's side. If Flynn is broke, just so much more reason for these men to be certain of jobs at a fair wage either here or somewhere else. If other companies are paying more than Flynn is you can't expect a working man to get soft hearted and go on working for charity.

"And, McNally, you keep stalling and asking 'em to wait until Young Jim shows up. Young Jim Flynn!"—with a sneer. "Any one of you ever see him? No! Not one. Neither have I. Has he ever been in the woods? Not on this job, anyhow. I'll tell you the stories they tell about him. He's a drunken bum; he's a worthless punk, son of a rich man, as unreliable as a pet wolf, and that's the kind of a boss you're asked to hang on and wait for and work for less than's your rightful due until he gets here!"

Men nodded. Franz saw that he was swinging them. He gestured and went on.

"He may never show up and maybe that's just what his father figures: that he isn't supposed to show up here! Oh, there's a lot of bunk spread about Old Jim Flynn! I'm here to tell you that the old devil has traded on sympathy for years! At heart he's a d—d black skunk, Old Jim Flynn is!"

In the doorway, a threatened stir. Steve Drake felt the skin along his spine commence to crawl.

"Old Jim Flynn!" Franz cried again. "You've been brought up to think of him as a little tin god. And what's he been showed up as? A crook, doesn't it look like? A d—d, double-crossing snake who—"

The stir in the doorway developed, this time. Steve Drake shouldered his way roughly through the onlookers who had stood in front of him, angered breath quick in his throat.

He was thinking that now was the time to render service to the man who had served him and his father so well. He was thinking that one man can do another no greater favor than defend his good name; that this opportunity to show his sense of obligation was a gift of the gods, that in another half hour he might have been too late to call this man to account for his cowardly tirade.

And so he broke Franz short with a hand on his arm, spinning him about and saying, as he dropped his pack-sack to the floor:

"I guess I got here about in time!"—because that thought was uppermost in his mind after those years of waiting to do something for Old Jim.

"Who're you to horn in?"

"Never mind me! I don't matter. Nothing matters except what you had to say about Old Jim. What you said about Young Jim don't count but the things you spit out about old Jim . . . Are you going to swallow 'em now or have those words driven back into your d—d gullet?"

"Who the h—l besides you thinks—"

"Maybe nobody! Besides, I'm doing the talking now and I'm asking you: are you going to tell these boys you were off on the wrong foot about Old Jim now or are you going—"

Franz was not a weakling nor a physical coward; neither was he a slow thinker. He knew the fighting light when he saw it surge into a man's eyes. One thing only was there for him to do: strike first.

His knuckles caught Steve on the point of the chin, drove his head backward, sent his arms flinging wide; he reeled and lurched and, dizzy from the shock, did what his fuddled wits told him to do: sagged forward, clasping the other tightly with his arms.

Franz tried to break that clinch. He rained blows on Steve's head, pummeled at his ribs and back but his arms were hampered and he could put no great drive behind his fists. Steve's mind was clearing and when Franz swore thickly in rage at his helplessness he let go his hold voluntarily, coming to a square stance and striking savagely as Franz staggered away from him.

The man was going away, yes, but the blow, full on the lips, caught him at arm's length, a stinging crash and his legs wilted and sagged, letting him slowly down.

Drake stood over him, feet wide apart, elbows crooked, breath loud in his throat. Except for that sound the place was very still and the faces of the group reflected the thought that here indeed was a man! He had withstood the hardest blow Franz had at command, and with one of his own had floored his adversary. It simply was not possible that Franz would rise and carry on the fight.

"Now," Steve said, "did I drive 'em all back? Those filthy words about Old Jim Flynn?"

Franz did not answer. He felt of his swelling lips and looked upward. In that look was hatred, chagrin, perhaps a threat; but it was, first of all, a beaten look and Steve hitched at his belt and turned to retrieve his hat, well satisfied.

As he turned he confronted McNally, who stood on the inner edge of the wide-eyed circle of men. He was holding Steve's new pack-sack which he had snatched up when the fight started. He had been staring at it: at the flap with the black, five-pointed star branded on it, and the bold, black initials: "J. F. Jr." He looked again at those letters and once again at the man who had borne the pack into the place and his jaw dropped.

"'Y G—d!" he muttered, only half aloud. His mustache twitched and a smile as of incredible relief wreathed his face. "'Y G—d! Is them initials right? J. F. Junior? Is that so? Are you Young Jim?"

The one thing common to each of the score of men in the place as McNally, finger on the letters, put his question, was amazement. The thing was as unexpected as a thunderclap on a clear day, sudden, dramatically staged. But of them all Steve himself was the most completely dumbfounded. He, taken for Young Jim Flynn!

Steve looked from the eager McNally, whose eyes and voice and gestures attested to relief after long strain, to those others. Moments ago they had been truculent, rebellious. But now, thinking that one with authority to meet their demands had come, thinking that he had on his very entrance into their lives established himself as outstanding, they had changed.

A hot, stinging impulse welled up within him. Five minutes before, Polaris and Old Jim Flynn had surely been on the brink of humiliating disaster. But now . . . Why, with a crew showing such respect for one they believed to be their employer, anything might be possible!

A voice seemed to float to him, his father's voice, coming down through the years in memory:

"If ever we get the chance, Stevie . . ."

He put out his hand to take that of McNally.

"And I wasn't," he began, "any more than in time, was I, Mac?"

"Well, well!" mumbled Wartin, who had been spokesman for the discontented men, impelled to such mild expletive, probably, by shock. "Well, well!" He spat and grinned amiably. "This, now, makes everything look a little different, don't it, boys? Mebby we can get an answer to the question we come to ask, now."

Drake let his eyes run from one to the other and grinned again. He was breathing easier but he needed time, much time.

"Does everything happen that fast up here?" he asked, and his grin provoked sudden grins in the others. "Why, I step into camp and before I get a chance to introduce myself I get knocked out from under my hat and cuffed and slapped and h—l-rose with! Then, before I get my hair slicked down and my ears pinned back you come at me for an answer to a matter I never heard about until I stepped through that door! I ask you, lads, is that the way you treat anybody who happens to come dropping in on this headquarters?"

A rumble of laughter greeted this.

"Well, likely it is a little fast," admitted Wartin. "As for you gettin' knocked from under your hat . . . Well, we seen how far Franz got with that, good as we know he is. I guess you can take care of yourself, Mr. Flynn. But you're here now, and, I s'pose,"—serious again—"we can bank on your listenin' to us in, say, a day or two."

"I'm about the best listener you ever told your troubles to!"

Wartin snapped his suspenders and nodded.

"That's reasonable. I guess we can't ask for any more tonight."

A half-hour later, when the men had all started their drift back to the wood camp ready for at least a few days' more work, McNally escorted Steve from the store toward his dwelling where, he said, the room occupied by Old Jim when he made his infrequent visits to Good-Bye was waiting and ready.

Wide Choice in Styles of Towels

Towels in fancy styles were never more in vogue than today. They certainly are being featured so that every homemaker can have her choice of kinds to suit her preference. There are so many different kinds that each member of the family can have his or her special design, readily known at a glance. And the guest towels can differ from them all.

Towels with reversible color schemes are in high favor. One side may be blue, the reverse green, or it may be that canary yellow towels will present orchid surfaces when turned over, or again, the towels may be rose toned on one side with white as the reverse color. The schemes are many and interesting.

Fringed towels are again returning to fashion. The fringe is apt to be rather short, so that it launders easier than long fringe. The latter requires hand ironing in which the fringe is either beaten straight and even by flecking it against the edge of the ironing board before the towel itself is pressed, or by combing out the fringe when the towel is laid on the board. A coarse comb is required, and gentle combing, so that threads do not tear or pull away. Well-laundered knotted fringed towels make a handsome array on a towel rack, and the shorter well-laundered fringed towels are similarly pleasing.

Plaid towels are bizarre, when colors are strong and plaids pronounced. Or they can be beautifully soft in tones as well as texture when colors in pastel shades are combined in the plaids. One advantage of these towels is that they do not show every mark and crease as plainly as do the flat colored textiles.

One of the interesting varieties in the new towels combines differences of weaves with colors. For example, a herringbone weave may be used for the body of the towel, while the border in contrasting color is in plain weave.

A personal note is instilled into a two-color towel when an initial in the contrasting tone is worked on it or a filet letter is inserted. For any who care to so mark their towels, whatever their style, old English letters for working in cross stitch through canvas on them or made in filet crochet to be appliqued onto linens can usually be purchased for about five cents each.

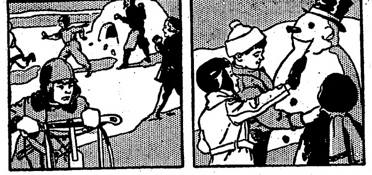
Whose Fault?



If a Child Won't Play with Others?

Parents who understand children know where to place the blame when a youngster mopes, keeps to himself, or is "ugly" toward others. Sluggishness ruins any disposition, and that's what is usually wrong. But it's just as wrong to dose that child with sickening cathartics. Until 15—or older—a child's bowels need but little aid—a very mild form of help. Stronger things often upset the stomach or weaken the bowel muscles. For the happy solution of this problem see what to do, in the next column:

There are happy, healthy boys and girls who have never known the bitter taste and violent action of castor oil—or similar cathartics. The only "medicine" they ever get—or ever need—to help the bowels is plain California Syrup of Figs. The senna in this fruity syrup has the natural laxative action that assists Nature as it should. Next day, the child feels and acts himself, and has a normal appetite. But use the real California Syrup of Figs, with the word "California" on the label and on the bottle.

THEY'RE BARRED

Three Javanese fruit bats, known as "flying foxes," came to California by steamer recently, consigned to the Catalina islands aviaries. Effort was made to have the strange creatures admitted alive, promise being made that they would be closely confined, but the quarantine service at San Pedro would not pass them, as they constitute a major fruit pest in their native land. The bats were then killed and turned over to the Los Angeles museum for stuffing and preservation. The fruit bat is common in the Philippines and the Far East and is said to be a voracious consumer of fruit and fruit blossoms. —Los Angeles Times.

Why Liquid Laxatives Do You No Harm

The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be regulated to suit individual need. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will a mild liquid laxative irritate the kidneys.

The right liquid laxative will bring a perfect movement, and with no discomfort at the time, or afterward.

The wrong cathartic may often do more harm than good.

An approved liquid laxative (one which is most widely used for both adults and children) is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, a prescription. It is perfectly safe. Its laxative action is based on senna—a natural laxative. The bowels will not become dependent on this form of help, as they may do in the case of cathartics containing mineral drugs. Ask your druggist for Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Member N. R. A.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

President Asks for Shorter Hours and Higher Wages; Plans for Continuing Relief Program; Desperate Dillinger Escapes From Jail.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

SEVERAL thousand members of the code authorities gathered in Constitution hall, Washington, at the call of the President to revise and strengthen NRA industrial agreements. The opening session was formal and rather stately, with the members of the cabinet, other high government officials and many senators and congressmen present. Before this assembly came Mr. Roosevelt to tell not so much what had been accomplished in the last twelvemonth as what he hoped for in the near future. He warned the industrial leaders that "the government cannot forever continue to absorb the whole burden of unemployment." He called for greater protection of small business, terming the code authority "the keeper of your small industrial brother."

Briefly summarized, this is what Mr. Roosevelt proposed:

Wage increases and shortening of hours to bolster consuming power and spread employment.

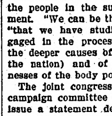
Greater adherence by the people to the Blue Eagle symbol to make all "play the game."

Continued enforcement of the anti-trust laws to retain competition and prevent monopoly.

Strict adherence by employers to the law allowing free choice by employees of representatives to do their collective bargaining.

Permanent reorganization of the economic and social structure along the lines already started.

COMPLETION of President Roosevelt's first year in the White House called forth a chorus of laudation and of hostile criticism from his admirers and his opponents. The least that can be said is that it has been a year of excitement and action, of bold experimentation in methods of government, and of the spending of vast sums of money in the furtherance of the President's determination to establish a New Deal that amounts to a social revolution.



President Roosevelt

Mr. Roosevelt himself, in a brief address on the occasion of the installing of Dr. J. M. Gray as chancellor of the American university in Washington, said "one of the most salient features of the salient year in our American life has been the amazing and universal increase in the interest" of the people in the subject of government. "We can be thankful," he said, "that we have studied and are engaged in the process of eradicating the deeper causes of that illness (of the nation) and of many other illnesses of the body politic."

The joint congressional Republican campaign committee took occasion to issue a statement declaring that the administration ends its first year "with many platform pledges untried and practically abandoned, with policies unshaped and conflicting, with its monetary program bewilderingly uncertain—a situation baffling enough to prove a hindrance to a return to prosperity."

Replying for the supporters of the administration, Senator Hiram Johnson of California, nominally a Republican, said:

"It is not necessary to agree with all that has been done in every conceivable particular, but unfair and unjust would be the individual who would not emphatically concede that with an enlightened audacity the President has acted, and has accomplished amazing results.

"It is a sorry policy that now says to 120,000,000 people that nothing has been done that is right and that the President has brought them no relief, and the future holds for them no hope.

"We are better, and our country is better, and our people are better, and our times are better for what the President has done during the past year."

Throughout his first year the President has had the virtually united support of the Democrats, together with that of many Republicans, and the nation as a whole has stood back of him because it recognized his courage and sincerity, even though many citizens doubted the wisdom of some of his policies. In the year to come he probably will find his task harder in a way, for revolt against some parts of his program is developing in his own party. Congress shows a growing tendency to resist his demands. All this, as one correspondent says, "is partly due to the oncoming November elections and partly to the natural fact that renewal of confidence reduces the willingness of political and economic individualists to sacrifice their own desires for the sake of a unified movement."

MACHINERY for enforcement of the collective bargaining provisions of the NRA was tightened by the President when by Executive order he made the findings of the national labor board final and authorized that body to report violations directly to the compliance division of the NRA or to the Department of Justice for appropriate action. In the same order the President enlarged the board from nine to thirteen members. The new men appointed are: Clay Williams, president Reynolds Tobacco company, and Leon Marshall, of Johns Hopkins university law school, vice chairmen; and Ernest Draper, of New York; Gerard Swope, president of the General Electric company, and Henry Dennison, of Framingham, Mass., industrial members.

NEW DEALERS were pleased immensely by a decision of the United States Supreme court sustaining the New York milk control law. It upheld the right of a state to fix a minimum price for milk, and has an important bearing on the validity of recovery legislation. The opinion was delivered by Justice Owen J. Roberts, and, as in the Minnesota mortgage moratorium case, was held by five of the justices, four dissenting.

HOW the President proposes to carry on the relief program was revealed at a press conference. In addition to continuation of the CWA in cities, relief of distressed families in rural regions is to be placed on a new basis, and the government is to undertake the transportation of entire communities from non-operating coal mine localities and similar centers of unemployment to the subsistence homestead colonies which are being created with $25,000,000 of public works funds.

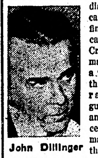
In rural regions families in distress are to be helped to raise enough food for subsistence and to get part time employment in industries and on road building and other public works.

Communities of miners, out of work because of the closing down of coal mines, the President calls "stranded populations." They were left stranded when work gave out and there is no prospect of a resumption of mine operations. In most cases the mines have been exhausted. The President said the undertaking would be to move an appreciable number of such families to localities where they can maintain themselves on small tracts of land with incidental industrial employment which is the subsistence homestead idea now being tried out at Reedsville, W. Va.

Concerning that Reedsville plant, a pet of Mrs. Roosevelt's, it is interesting to read that the house refused by a margin of 165 votes to approve the construction and operation there of a factory to make post office furniture. The project was denounced as "a plunge into state socialism."

ONCE more the tariff comes up as a leading issue, for the President has sent to congress a request for new powers permitting him to fix the tariff within wide limits. The legislation he asks is designed to expand trade and would give the Chief Executive authority to shift the tariff up or down by as much as 50 per cent so that reciprocal tariff treaties with other nations may be negotiated. Furthermore, these treaties would not have to be confirmed by the senate, and the tariff commission would not be consulted. The new authority would be limited to three years and no article could be placed on the free list or removed from it. It was predicted that many Republicans and some Democrats would oppose the scheme, but that it would get through congress after long debate.

JOHN DILLINGER, eminent bank robber, gang leader and alleged murderer, who was captured with great eclat in Arizona and conveyed to Indiana for trial, became irked by confinement in the "escape-proof" jail at Crown Point. So he made a pistol out of a piece of wood and the handle of a safety razor, cowed the guards and deputies and locked them in cells, obtained two machine guns from the jail armory and a pistol from a guard, took Sheriff Lillian Holley's car from the garage and drove away with a negro murderer. They took one deputy sheriff and a garage attendant as hostages but released them near Peotone, Ill., and then vanished. It was believed Dillinger was hidden somewhere in the vicinity of Chicago. The law authorities of the Middle West were all searching for him, and all officers had orders to kill him at sight.



John Dillinger

Sheriff Holley's car was found abandoned on a street in Chicago.

This escape of the desperado was one of the boldest performances of his career, and it is amazing to consider how it could have been successfully carried out, in view of Dillinger's record. Perhaps some sympathy is due the woman sheriff, Mrs. Holley, who was given that office after the death of her husband. Terribly depressed by the fiasco, she made the futile gesture of strapping an automatic about her waist and setting out to find Dillinger.

Part Played by Beaver in History of America

In the rush of packing and getting tickets for your outing next summer you will not give a thought to the history making beaver and the part he had in developing the country you are starting out to see. But he had a big part in making history and in making land. The beaver is the little chap that kept beckoning to the explorers who made a profit on his pelt. He led them to great lakes and great rivers, over mountains and into wonder valleys.

New York state's shield accords a prominent place to the little animal which was the corner stone of trade in Colonial days, says the American Nature association of Washington which will, on request, give you information on the beaver. His onetime importance is enshrined in the heroic traditions of the Hudson's Bay company and of the North West company of Canada and in the accounts of Alexander Mackenzie's epic journeys to the Arctic and the Pacific. All these British undertakings had the beaver for their foundation.

But the United States can boast an equal indebtedness to this little rodent. During millenniums prior to our forefathers' landing on these shores the beaver had been damming the streams and so retaining in the impounding waters the silt and humus which would otherwise have been carried to the sea.

Fertility of most of our valleys, our farms and even our flower gardens was initiated by the teeth of a small, furry and tireless gnawer who made arable the valleys which the ice age had created, thereby becoming our pioneer agronomist. His successful efforts at soil reclamation antedated the earliest experiments of the Department of Agriculture and the Garden club of America by probably at least a million years.

This was the condition when, in 1609, Samuel de Champlain entered the northern part of present New York state and Henry Hudson sailed his Half Moon into New York bay, ascended the river that now bears his name, and, on reaching where today is the city of Albany, ascertained that he had missed the way to China.

These two men's arrivals had much to do with furs. Champlain was confessedly seeking to enlarge the area of the peltry business of New France—an attempt he promptly thwarted by a few ill-advised shots which, aimed at Iroquois Indians, transmuted the Algonquian confederacy into an active military alliance with the British and so changed the course of civilization in eastern North America.

Henry Hudson, though primarily in quest of a route to China, made his employer in Holland a report which, dealing with the commercial possibilities of New Amsterdam's furs, was so enthusiastically phrased that for the next 17 years peltries formed practically the sole enterprise of the Dutch colonists who settled in our country. The nucleus of all this peltry trade was the beaver.

BULLET-PROOF STEEL

A nickel-chromium-molybdenum steel suitable for bullet-proof vests, has been developed in Japan, according to the Literary Digest. Treated to give a tensile strength of 180,000 pounds or more per square inch, this material in sheet form five-thousandths of an inch thick will flatten a bullet at average velocities on impact, and sheets as thin as thirty-five ten-thousandths of an inch will stop penetration sufficiently to protect human life.

When I Grow Up

When I am alone, I sometimes sit
And then I begin to think a bit,
When it's dark I lie in my bed
And deep thoughts are in my head.

I think of what I am going to be
When I'm older, you must see,
I want to be a teacher
And maybe the wife of a preacher.
I want to teach
In a schoolhous on the beach,
I want to teach the first and second grades
With jolly boys and laughing maids.
Sometimes I think I'll be real cross
If the children try to be the boss
And if they're good all day long
When I go home I'll sing a song.

Income Tax Law Held Valid

Praising the unanimous decision of the Minnesota Supreme Court in favor of the constitutionality of the income tax law, R. A. Trovatten, Minnesota Commissioner of Agriculture, Dairy and Food, cites this judicial act as an important farm relief measure.

Commissioner Trovatten said that this law will eventually alleviate the burden of taxation which now rests heavily upon the backs of the farmer and the home owner and place it where it belongs, "upon those who are able to pay."

"Those earning large incomes," he said, "are naturally opposed to the law. But it seems rather selfiish that they should insist that the farmer and the home owner continue to pay such a large share of the cost of government. Farmers have won a victory."

New CCC Enlistment

There will be a new enlistment for the Civilian Conservation Camps between the 2nd and 15h day of April. The caliber of the boys will also be a decided fact in their selection.

No Funds For Mud Lake

Some time ago Sheriff John P. Bordewich made a trip out thru Mud Lake. While out there he was asked many questions about the Mud Lake Project that has been talked about so much in the past few months. To settle the matter Mr. Bordewich wrote to Senator Henrik Shipstead for information on the subject.

Senator Shipstead took the matter up with the Bureau of Biological Survey in Washington and following is a letter he sent back to Bordewich.

Desr Mr. Bordewich:

I enclose herewith letter I have received from the Bureau of Biological Survey giving me the present status of the establishment of a refuge at Mud Lake, Minnesota.

I regret that I cannot give you more definite information, for the reason that funds are not available at this time.

Very truly your,
Henrik Shipstead.

Following is the answer Senator Shiptead received from the Bureau of Biological Survey:

Dear Senator Shipstead:

Refererence is made to your letter of March 7 transmitting Mr. Bordewich's communication addressed to you, dated March 5.

Up to this time nothing constructive has been done looking to the establishment of a refuge at Mud Lake, Minnesota, for the reason that no funds have been available with which to aquire the lands there, nor to do the work necessary to restore it to its former usefulness as a concentration point for migratory waterfowl.

While the Biological Survey has made a detailed examination of the area, the material so assembled, including the type maps, is considered confidential and the Department and the Migratory - Bird Conservation Commission have held that it cannot be made available to the public.

No other maps, so far as we are aware, have been published regarding the Mud Lake area as a Federal Migratory Bird Refuge site.

Very sincerely yours,
W. C. Henderson
Acting Chief.

Safetygrams by Fred W. Braun © The Safety Man

The other day I talked to a man who had driven an automobile 20 years and he told me that he had never had an accident of any kind, not even as much as scratching another's fender.

I was very complimentary of this fine safety record and felt that a man with such a record behind him must certainly feel a thrill.

I asked him, "How do you do it?" He said this:

I have a system all my own. I always drive with the idea that at every turn in the road I expect to meet the world's prize fool. I always glue myself to my half of the road and sometimes I drive on the shoulder to avoid an oncoming jackass. I always slow down at each intersection because I expect some of these intersections filled with road hogs and driving maniacs and speed cranks."

In other words, what this man tried to convey to me was this: He avoided the driving fools and anticipated trouble at intersections and and slowed down. Good wisdom.

Use these columns to advertise that unneeded, but valuable article for sale or exchange.

CWA To End Soon

The CWA will end shortly and our present information, is that it will be substituted with work for relief families only. It would probably save considerable time later on if those people who expect to need relief in the next few months would come to the County Relief Office at Warren, and make their application for relief at the present time.

All cases will be investigated before men are sent to work and the amount which they can earn will be determined by this investigation states Mr. Easter.

CHAPTER III

Next morning Steve rose, a bit stiff from his encounter with Franz, and dressed slowly.

He inventoried the room as he clothed himself. A desk stood in one corner, maps hung on the wall. A fireplace was in one end with a bearskin before it; here and there was a photograph of a girl.

The light was still faint and he wondered if it could be a trick of its deficiency which made this photograph strike him breathless. He took the print from its place on the mantel and walked to the window. Holding it to the light a little tingle ran through his body.

She wore high pacs and riding breeches; a shirt was open at a slender throat. Light, short hair crowned a face that he thought was the most lovely he had ever looked upon. She was smiling, showing small, even teeth. His pulses speeded up a trifle and he turned sharply, almost guiltily, as the door opened and McNally stepped in.

"Mornin'!" he cried. "Up a'ready?"

"Morning," replied Steve, swallowing. He was fairly caught, now. McNally had seen.

"Oh, you found Katy's picture, eh? Our niece took that two years ago when she was up with your dad. You sure got a fine lookin' sister, Young Jim!"

"Y-yes. . . . Yes, you're right. She's not bad looking." He swallowed again, certain that his confusion would betray him and he did not know how far McNally might be trusted with the secret that he was only a pretender.

"I sure hope her eyes are goin' to turn out all right!"

Steve recalled, then, what Young Jim's guide had told him yesterday.

"We're all hoping that!" he replied fervently.

"And LaFane got in after you went to bed. He brought the mail. There's a letter from Katy to me, tellin' me to open the letters that's piled up here for you if you don't show up soon. She's worried, not having heard from you since you left Chicago."

Now here, thought Steve, was something else again. To sit down deliberately and open and read mail addressed to another brought up a point that for a moment baffled him. McNally, however, helped with the solution.

"I'd figured if you didn't get here in a day or two I'd open that stack of letters myself, on my own hook. With the job in such a bad way and things comin' up for a show-down, with our right-of-way blocked and the wood camp ready to go on strike, danged if I wouldn't 've opened Katy's letters, Jim, to see if I couldn't do something for your daddy. You know," he added, somewhat embarrassed, "there've been stories."

"About Yo— About me, you mean?"

"Yup. No use beatin' around th' bush. Nobody up here's even seen you and likely most of the rumors are lies. But it's got around that the old man's had to keep you close tied for a long time account of one thing or another. So when you didn't show up we all got to thinkin' that mebby . . . well . . . You know how it is."

"Yes. I understand. But it shouldn't be what's said about a man that counts, should it? It's what the man does, that should be looked over. Am I right?"

McNally agreed, and while he talked, Steve, lacing his pacs, considered the problem of the true Young Jim Flynn's proximity. Suppose some drunken whim should send him in here today or tomorrow? What would men like those he talked with last night think of the whisky-sodden wreck he had seen yesterday? Could Young Jim, in his condition, persuade men to work on? And if the one with true authority should appear and take charge . . . He shrugged that contingency off and went out to breakfast.

He learned things at the meal: that the McNallys had been here at Good-Bye for five years, simply watching the property; that a man who walked along the beach, a half dozen setters playing about him, was LaFane, the mail carrier. . . . And the way McNally spoke of LaFane marked him as of particular interest.

Immediately after the meal Drake returned to his room, shut himself in and began ripping open the letters addressed to James Flynn, Jr., at Shoestring. They were typewritten. He observed from the heading that he was posing as vice president of the Polaris Forest Products Co., that Katharine Flynn was secretary and treasurer and that Old Jim was president of the concern.

The first letter—he had arranged them by dates—was signed in typewritten characters by the single word Kate.

"Dear Duffer," it began. "Now you're on your way, the last hope of a family! I'm betting on you this time. We've both got to stand behind Dad and push him out of this awful hole. You and I could stand going broke but he can't because he's too old to start in at the bottom again. If the booze reaches out after you, just remember that the old Dad is flat on his back in a hospital bed, with months more of it ahead of him. I'm behind you in every effort you make. I'm only half a helper now, of course, being as blind as the celebrated bat. The doctor insists that I keep the light from my eyes for weeks yet. No use sobbing. Grin!"

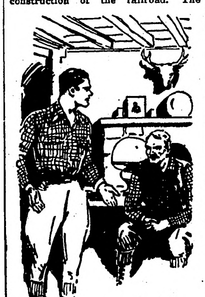
Steve looked up at the photograph on the mantel again. Tough, indeed, to think of that face masked by a bandage; of those eyes, so wide and bright and winsome in the photograph, bereft of sight.

"I moved the office yesterday and let the girls go. That was hard to do but we must save every penny now. Praise, be, I can type blindfolded and have a cheap little girl to read to me. The minute you are on the job write me fully. If McNally only were a bigger man he might carry the load but Dad insists and I, too, know that he can't command. I shan't feel easy as long as Franz is in the country, as Thorpe said in his last letter that he was.

"Keep McNally driving the railroad through. It seems to be our last chance. And remember: now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of Polaris!"

A cheerful, brave letter! He looked again at the photograph and experienced another thrill.

The next was more subdued. Problems, complicated and grave, were before them. To keep pulp going down the river in sufficient quantities for the regular call of the barge which came up Lake Superior to load was of first importance. If that stopped, a contract would be broken; with the breaking of that contract, creditors would shut down immediately. Money was short; there was scarcely enough to keep the crews going and continue construction of the railroad. The building of that, it developed, was a race against time. A final grant of credit had been extended by the banks grudgingly; to save this remnant of Polaris holdings, and on which sound expansion might be based, a mill must be up, receiving and sawing logs by November.



"All Right; We'll Give 'Em What They Want," He Said Abruptly.

Steve frowned. Hadn't McNally and Smoky, the guide, both said the right-of-way had been blocked?

In later letters a note of pleading appeared. Kate was desperately worried at not hearing from Jim at Good-Bye.

"Please, please write to me," she begged. "Every day I have to lie to the old Dad and say you are there. If he knew what I know, it might kill him, Duffer!"

After he had gone through all the mail he searched for one particular letter and re-read a paragraph:

"If only we could get a binding option on the MacDonald tract the Old National would come across with enough to let us draw a deep breath. Not only would they finance that purchase but they wouldn't drive us so hard to commence operating the Good-Bye stuff. If the Laird weren't such a hard-boiled old rascal! Still, there's always a chance. You're at bat; keep your eye on the ball!"

He stared through the window which gave a view of the lake. The man, LaFane, was sitting in the sand before a small log house. Three children played about him and he was tossing the smallest high in his arms.

McNally came out of the store and Steve, through the open window, hailed him.

"Now Mac, I've been through the mail," he began, "and the situation, with all that's happened in Chicago since Yo—since I left, doesn't seem so good. Still, we're alive, and while there's life there's hope. You've been here a long time, you know the country better than any of us. I wish you'd tell me just what your slant on this job is and tell it from the beginning, just as if I were hearing the whole thing for the first time."

The older man scratched his head and hitched his chair before a wall map.

"Well, likely you know more 'n I do about the bank end of it. That's bad enough, I guess. But, seeing as you've never been here before . . .

"Now, here we are: Here's the Polaris stumpage, inside this red line. This block south of us, cuttin' across the river below our line, is MacDonald's timber. It takes in Twenty Mile rapid, you see. To the west of it, country breaks off into pine barrens and that's where we aimed to come with the grade. I've got it fifteen miles out from the main line, right up to here. That's where we went on three days ago and found No Trespass signs up."

"Blocked, eh?"

"Tighter than a drum! I thought when I mentioned it at breakfast you took it awful danged calm!"

"I'd heard rumors on the way in."

"Well, this is a body blow!" the old man declared grimly. "That stuff just ahead of our grade, Franz claims, is his. Well, I know dam' well he don't own an acre anywhere. He's just actin' for the Bensons. Could they squeeze us out and buy our timber from th' banks, they'd have this whole country except the Laird's stuff.

"Of course, MacDonald won't sell. We can't build to the east of him because she's so rough that a grade would bust us. So we picked out this cheap and easy route. An old feller down below Shoestring owned these three sections and he give Thorpe his word we could cross. Where Thorpe made his mistake was in not gettin' an easement from him; somebody found out about that, let us get the work done right up to that line, bought the land up and blocked us tight. Franz was cool as a cucumber about it, said he had somethin' we wanted bad and that he was ready to let the courts decide the value. That means, of course, that we're cooked. If it's Benson behind Franz they'll hold us up just as long as the Laird would."

He sat back and sighed.

"There she lays, Jimmy! From all I can guess, added to what Thorpe told me, it's the pulp wood contract that's keepin' the job alive until fall; and if we don't have steel to get our logs out on and a mill runnin' by the time snow flies we're all in. And them lads in camp've got to have an answer to their question in short order."

Steve paced the room. Hard, spending another man's money, indeed; but if he delayed again he well knew that the production of pulp bolts would cease and he had the seriousness of that contingency not only from McNally but from Kate's letters. The increased cost of production might be serious but the complete shut-down would spell disaster. He was here to help Old Jim.

"All right; we'll give 'em what they want," he said abruptly.

"Good!" McNally grinned broadly. "I was hopin' you'd see it straight, Young Jim!"

Adroitly, covering his own utter ignorance of situations and men, Steve learned other things:

That Franz had come into the country three years before, posing as a cruiser; that he had met Kate and Old Jim at Good-Bye; that Kate had been charmed by him for a time, that suspicion had been born in her, that evidence finally had been unearthed that Franz was only an agent for Benson interests, spying on Polaris and working craftily to put himself into the good graces of Duncan MacDonald, whose property would have served as a key holding to either of the larger outfits.

MacDonald, or the Laird, as he was known locally, was a wealthy recluse whose one passion was trout fishing. He had steadfastly refused to sell his timber or to grant a right-of-way for Flynn's railroad through it.

LaFane. . . . "What about LaFane?" Steve asked.

"He's another queer one; these woods seem to be full of 'em! He's been in here, squattin' on your property, since before I come. Old Jim didn't molest him; sort of liked the man, I guess. LaFane is the best woodsman I've ever seen but he won't work at it. He breaks bird dogs for sports, traps a little and, recent, 's been carryin' the mail.

"I been thinkin' about him a lot, these last days. Franz's been tryin' to chum up to him and I had a notion mebby he'd like to get hold of some of our letters. I don't think LaFane'd sell out, but he's a queer one. I've always figured he'd be a wonder at handlin' men if he would, but he'd rather work with dogs. Just now he's got a wild thing over there and thinks he's going to develop a strain of sled dogs.

"Yes, sir, LaFane's a queer fish! The gentlest man with children you've ever seen. All wrapped up in his kids. I've watched him handle a drunken lumber-jack just like he would a dog and you'd think there wasn't a kind hair in his head, then. He don't beat 'em up, understand. Just a natural-born handler. And hard! D—d, how hard he is! He don't warm up to anybody except his kids and his dogs."

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Learning of Polaris' dire straits, and hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters. He finds Franz, a scoundrel, plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew, by lucky chance, assumes that he is Flynn's son, and he does not disillusion them. Steve takes charge, as "Young Jim."

Music That Counts

"There is but one kind of music," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "which completely satisfies the soul, and that is the kind men make by the simple process of beating their hands together in applause."

BEAUTY TALKS

NEW BEAUTY STANDARDS

AT FASHIONABLE restaurants and clubs, one sees evidence of new beauty standards. The smart woman is depending upon her own beauty to carry the honors, not upon embellishments, not upon gay or gaudy clothes, but upon the gleam of her hair, the transparent clarity of her skin, the perfection of her makeup, the groomed, cared-for look of hands, brows, face, figure; every item in the beauty ensemble.

Clothes depend on lines and intricate details of tailoring for their beauty. But faces present new and higher standards of feminine loveliness. Brows are more natural in shape, darker, and therefore more interesting; lashes, too, one does not see that blank look that very light brows and lashes inevitably impart. There's a youthful glow and freshness on faces that have seen some forty years, fewer wrinkles, less sagging, and that black velvet band at the throat hiding a creepy throat is completely gone (the heavens be praised!).

As for the hair, it has indeed become "Woman's Crowning Glory." At present, it is carrying more honors than any other phase of the ensemble. Less jeweled tiaras, less metal caps for evening, more beautiful hair, more intricately arranged, more intriguingly soft, flattering, altogether feminine.

And make-up! For evening it is indeed the last deft touch that transforms even a plain woman into a breath-taking beauty. It seems that as the hours wane, from morning to noon to night, milady's loveliness must be enhanced. The skin grows fairer. Rouge becomes deeper hued. Powder is lighter. Lips become brighter, more vividly colored. And even the most conservative have adopted mascara and eyeshadow for the eyelids, brows and lashes, for formal occasions. A great many women use eye make-up for daytime, too, but for evening the whole world seems to have become eye-conscious. Which is as it should be, for the eyes are the most interesting feature of the face.

Don't misunderstand that these new and higher beauty standards are in evidence for evening wear only. No. women are more beautiful today, at any hour, than they were ten years ago. A more feminine, cared-for, chic and smart beauty which can be summed up in two words "good grooming."

If you have any organic trouble or suspect that you have, see your doctor and let him help you to health. For remember that health is the foundation of beauty.

THE PERMANENT WAVE

SEVERAL years ago, many women feared getting a permanent wave. Machines were still in the experimental stage, operators not all experts, and test curls were not given. But—"the old order changeth." If Mrs. X had a permanent three or four years ago, which left her hair dry and brittle and the ends splitting, her neighbor is not intimidated by these unsuccessful results. For the smart woman of today knows that there are permanents and permanents, operators and operators, and she knows above all that for the wave to be successful her hair must be in good condition first.

It is important to take preliminary steps, because, if the hair is very dry and brittle, the permanent may only make matters worse. On the other hand, excessively oily hair does not take a wave very well. Two or three weeks before a permanent, start wielding the hair brush as you never did before—make it two hundred instead of the proverbial hundred strokes. Massage the scalp, too. If your scalp is dry, massage with hot olive oil or castor oil the night before shampooing. If your scalp is oily, use a good hair tonic, or between shampoos use orris root or corn meal and brush carefully. When every bit of the dry shampoo has been brushed out of the hair, much of the oil and lint will have gone, too.

If you use a rinse after the shampoo, make sure that it will in no way conflict with the chemical action of the permanent wave.

I am often asked what method I approve. There are many that boast a good measure of success. Most of the machines have been perfected. the heat process is now well regulated. The important step is choosing a good operator, one who has a reputation for knowing the waving business, hair textures, the amount of heat necessary, etc. When this expert asks you whether your hair has ever been dyed, tell the truth. Answer truthfully any other questions about your hair. Some of the nationally-known waving experts offer a "test wave" or "test curl" which serves as a guide to whether or not the wave will take successfully, whether some bleach or dye will interfere with the chemical action of the wave, or some idiosyncrasy of hair or scalp make the permanent impossible or undesirable.

And after the wave, remember that the permanent does not mean the end of hair care. You must continue to keep scalp and hair in perfect condition, for a lovely wave and dull locks do not harmonize.

ANIMALS TAKE FEW RISKS

Big game hunters report that wild animals seldom die from accidents. The elephant weighs a couple of tons; he has a thick hide; when aroused, no living thing can withstand him, but he takes no chances. Is there not a lesson to be learned in this for human beings, who are so much weaker? We in America are thoughtless; both as drivers and as pedestrians, we take wanton chances with our own lives and with the lives of others. Most accidents occur either on the street or in the home. Curtis Billings suggests that mankind should learn the lesson of safety from the animals, for they have learned when fear is not cowardice. —Hygeia Health Magazine.

Why Children Need a Liquid Laxative

The temporary relief children get from unwise dosing with harsh cathartics may cause bowel strain, and even set up irritation in the kidneys. A properly prepared liquid laxative brings a perfect movement. There is no discomfort at the time and no weakness after. You don't have to give the child "a double dose" a day or two later.

Can constipation be safely relieved in children? "Yes!" say medical men. "Yes!" say many mothers who have followed this sensible medical advice: 1. Select a good liquid laxative. 2. Give the dose you find suited to the system. 3. Gradually reduce the dose until the bowels are moving regularly without aid.

An approved liquid laxative (one that is widely used for children) is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. The mild laxative action of this excellent preparation is the best form of help for children—and grown-ups, too. The dose can be regulated for any age or need.

Army Air Mail Service Is Suspended, Safer Schedule Is Planned—Cummings Starts Criminal Action Against Mellon on Income Tax Evasion Charges.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

BY DIRECTION of the President, all air mail operations by the army air corps were suspended by Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, chief of the corps, and the drafting of a new schedule that would insure greater safety for the flyers was begun. When the news reached him of the deaths of the ninth and tenth army mail carriers within three weeks Mr. Roosevelt sent out word: "The continuation of deaths in the army air corps must stop." He ordered that the carrying of air mail cease except "on such routes, under such weather conditions and under such equipment and personnel conditions as will insure, as far as the utmost care can provide, against constant recurrence of fatal accidents."

Gen. B. D. Foulois

General Foulois, Brig. Gen. Oscar Westover, chief of air mail operations, and various Post Office department officials built a revised "safety" route with the trans-continental line from Newark to San Francisco as the main line, other routes feeding into it. The intention was to reduce the number of trips on all schedules and to permit less night flying.

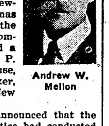
Colonel Lindbergh aroused interest by visiting Washington for two days and conferring with Secretary of War Dern. Soon after the secretary named the colonel, Orville Wright and Clarence Chamberlain on a committee to investigate the army carrying of the air mail.

General Foulois has been working on a plan by which army flyers could join with commercial pilots in receiving training. The step follows a suggestion by Mr. Roosevelt that "because military lessons have been taught us during the last few weeks," army aviators should train with those who "later on will fly the mail" in "night flying, blind flying and instrument flying."

Meanwhile committees of both house and senate were working out legislation along the lines of the President's request that the flying of the mails be returned to private companies under a new contract system.

The President's prompt action in the air mail matter, virtually admitting an error had been made, took some of the wind out of the sails of his opponents but did not entirely stop the attacks. Hiram Bingham, president of the National Aeronautic association and formerly Republican senator from Connecticut, demanded in a public statement that Mr. Roosevelt tell who had misled him as to the fitness of the army air corps and its planes to carry the mails. Both General Foulois and General MacArthur, chief of staff, were quoted in interviews as saying the army was equal to the task, but Bingham said that, so far as he could learn, the President had not consulted either of them before ordering the air corps to undertake the assignment.

CRIMINAL action for alleged evasion of the federal income tax law was ordered by Attorney General Cummings to be brought immediately against Andrew W. Mellon, former secretary of the treasury and one of the world's wealthiest men; T. L. Sidlow of Cleveland, law partner of Newton D. Baker; Thomas S. Lamont, son of the noted financier Thomas W. Lamont and a member of the J. P. Morgan banking house, and James J. Walker, former mayor of New York.



Andrew W. Mellon

Mr. Cummings announced that the Department of Justice had conducted a secret investigation of the tax affairs of these four men and had turned the information gathered over to United States attorneys in New York, Cleveland and Pittsburgh. Grand jury action in each of those cities was expected to result. Cases against more than a score of other men were being prepared by the department's tax division.

Mr. Mellon was quick to place his case before the people. In a long statement he denied ever having failed to pay his proper income taxes and said that in the last twenty years he had paid more than $20,000,000 in this form of rates. He characterized the attorney general's action as "politics of the crudest sort." He continued:

"I feel very strongly that before the attorney general of the United States should bring a charge of this kind against me I, like any other citizen, should be given proper notice in the manner provided by law of the government's intention to assess additional taxes and should have been afforded an opportunity to meet such charges in the customary way.

"In all my years of experience in the administration of the tax laws I have never known of a single instance in which such unfair and arbitrary action has been taken."

Several times since last May, when Congressman McFadden made charges against Mr. Mellon based on information given by one Olson, regarding what was called a specific tax evasion, Mr. Mellon said, he has requested Mr. Cummings to make a full investigation and received nothing better than an evasive response. In conclusion Mr. Mellon said: "I am glad the issue is joined at last and am quite content to leave the outcome to the courts and to the good sense and fairness of the American people when all the facts are known."

TWO hundred and thirty-one Democratic members of the house kicked over the traces and, with the aid of 59 Republicans, passed the Patman bill calling for the immediate payment of the veterans' bonus with greenbacks. The President has repeatedly expressed his opposition to the measure and indicated that he would veto it if it got through congress. Its passage by the senate was considered most doubtful.

There were only two reasonable explanations for the revolt of the Democrats. One was put in words by Representative John Y. Brown of Kentucky, a Democrat, who was in opposition. He said: "You are buying veterans' votes. You are holding out this piece of bait to get veterans' votes this summer. There is not a man in the house who believes this bill will ever become a law, and yet you sit here and vote for it for your own political welfare."

The other explanation was that many of the Democrats are resentful of the "rubber stamp" label that has been put on congress and welcomed an opportunity to break away from dictation and, as one of them said, vote as their consciences directed. Fred Britten of Chicago, Republican, charged that the Democrats supported the measure with the secret understanding that they would not vote to over-ride the President's veto.

SENATOR SIMEON D. FESS of Ohio is one of the most voluble of the administration's critics, and he found opportunity for another energetic attack when the senate was considering Senator Tom Connally's bill to include cattle among the basic commodities subject to farm adjustment control. The provision for an appropriation of $200,000,000 was the special point of assault by Fess, McNary of Oregon, Dickinson of Iowa, and Carey of Wyoming and Vandenberg of Michigan, all of whom agreed that the Agricultural adjustment program has been a complete failure. The Democrats, with the exception of Connally, made no reply to the verbal barrage.

Senator Fess

The Ohio senator said that hog prices had fallen instead of risen, that the prices of farm commodities not under the AAA had in many cases risen faster and higher than the so-called basic commodities.

"That sort of thing is nauseating to any decent person who wants business to be done in a business way," he said, alluding to the hog buying program. "It's time to stop this foolish experimentation, time to take the heavy hand of government off business and let business recover."

Senator Vandenberg and Senator McNary could not understand why $200,000,000 were required for cattle when only $100,000,000 were asked in the original bill covering six commodities.

JOSEPH B. EASTMAN and the Interstate Commerce commission have joined in recommending to congress legislation that will place under "the guiding hand of government control" the transportation agencies that use the highways and waterways of the country. Their report, which was submitted to the President, declares that regulation of motor and water transportation is necessary "if a threatening chaos is to be transformed into order." Such regulation, they said, should be concentrated in the Interstate Commerce commission.

In proposing changes in the interstate commerce act, the co-ordinator and the commission recommend liberalization of the long and short haul clause forbidding a railroad to charge less for a longer than a shorter haul, except on permission from the commission.

This clause is held by middle western interests to have damaged them substantially by preventing traffic moving by rail to the Pacific coast, and its repeal is now being sought.

ONE of Japan's new torpedo boats the Tomozuru, of 527 tons, was wrecked mysteriously off the Sasebo naval base and it was believed most of her crew of 113 men were lost. The vessel was completed only February 26 last and was a new type, carrying the heaviest armament ever given a ship of its size. It was considered a triumph of Japanese naval architecture. Several others of the same type are under construction.

Matter of Diet and Weight

Abundant Proof That It Is Not Always the Amount of Food Eaten That Regulates the State of Fat; Definite Program Needed.

Again comes a headline in a newspaper: "Scientist says weight is merely a matter of calories—all fat persons eat too much." Well, all of us know some people who eat largely and remain thin, and vice versa.

When I have talked to some of the research workers after hearing a lecture with the above text, I find that practically all of their experiences have been with persons who are so fat that they are obese. The specialists talk glibly about reducing people 50 to 100 or more pounds. They speak of original weights of 350 to 400 pounds. I have never been able to get them to commit themselves about cases of persons slightly over normal who would like to be thinner for the sake of comfort and beauty. Until I do I shall go on believing that there are some other facts besides the amount of food eaten, which regulates the state of fat.

There is one other admitted factor now, and that is, of course, exercise. Light diet, combined with exercises, if followed regularly, is most certain to bring results. People, however, sometimes get tired waiting, as in some cases it takes several weeks to begin to lose, while water replaces fat in tissues. Not long ago some one wrote to ask me what I thought of the use of glandular extracts in weight reduction. That is, of course, a question for a physician, but it has been shown that what will work with one person will have no effect upon another, perhaps because the activity of the extract is destroyed by the digestive juices. Sometimes two or more glandular extracts will be combined in treatment under the almost daily supervision of the physician—sometimes there are the desired results—and sometimes not.

Dieting also should usually be done under the direction of a physician. The specialists who work with really obese persons find it necessary to have them under hospital care, not only to see that the principle of the prescribed diet is followed but to see that no more food than is ordered is given sympathizing families. Persons who are slightly overweight must depend upon their own self-control in the selection of food.

It is however, much easier to follow a definite program made out by the doctor or dietitian than to attempt to follow orders by cutting down quantities just anywhere and any way.

The reason some published schemes of diet have worked in some cases is usually because diet directions were specified. If a plan is not definite enough, there may be one of them quite different in results—either too much food to reduce really, or too little food for health, may be taken.

A man told me the other day that he had been able to reduce his weight naturally by the simple method of giving up going out for lunch, and instead, having a bottle of milk sent in. One woman takes one day each week for a diet of fruit alone, and says she keeps fit. Another woman gave up eating all sweets and bread. The most pleasant and generally most practical method is to reduce sweet or starchy foods, and fats, to a minimum, at all three meals. It is a good plan to take a cupful of hot bouillon, or tea, or a glass of milk between the frugal meals. In the meals themselves should remain plenty of fruit and vegetables.

Fabric Sticks to Metal

A worker at a prominent institute has devised a method of combining metal with any sort of fibrous material by means of a metal adhesive consisting of certain low-melting alloys which will cling to both metal and fiber without affecting the properties of either. One of the first commercial results of the development is a form of corrugated roofing in which sheet metal is protected on either side by asbestos fiber firmly attached. Other materials such as wool, felt or paper, can be bonded equally well to metal.

Poe's Graphic Sketch of Wissahickon Beauty

When Edgar Allan Poe lived and worked in Philadelphia from 1838 to 1844 the scenic beauties of the Wissahickon valley impressed the poet so much that he gave a vivid description of the region in a sketch with himself as the narrator.

The tale, entitled "Morning on the Wissahickon," reveals Poe drifting in a skiff upon the surface of the stream during a sultry summer day. In half slumber he lets his imagination conjure up visions of the Wissahickon of Indian days, "when picnics were undreamed of."

The picture is in striking contrast to the popular conception of the half-starved unhappy genius who wrote such morbid works as "The Raven" and "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," while living at 530 North Seventh street, where the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of his birthday was recently celebrated at a brilliant gathering of writers and other notables. The occasion also marked the opening of the Poe house as a shrine to his memory.

Extolling the beauties of the Wissahickon, Poe declared that "were it flowing in England it would be the theme of every bard, and the common topic of every tongue, if, indeed its banks were not parceled off in lots at exorbitant prices, as building sites for the villas of the opulent."

Manchu Bible Useless

One hundred years ago the English Bible society, at great expense, put an edition of the Bible in the Manchu language, then the official language of the Chinese court and government. When sent to China the books were found useless, as the Manchus were able to read Chinese, preferring Chinese to their own language, which had become almost confined to official use only.

For Wide Discussion of Economic Problems

A new experiment in rural adult education is under way in New Jersey with speakers drawn from various universities and state and federal organizations, including the United States Department of Agriculture. The University Institute of Rural Economics, as it is called, is sponsored by Rutgers university, and is being financed in its present form by the American Association of Adult Education.

The experiment is in two parts, one a form of agricultural extension which takes university instruction to eight rural community centers in New Jersey, and a second which assembles at the university selected leaders of rural affairs for discussion of current economic problems in forums led by the authorities who are the speakers at the community meetings. In the opinion of the department, as voiced by Secretary Wallace, there has never been more urgent need for widespread discussion and understanding of fundamental economic problems.

Cans Around The World

PHILLIPS LORD, who created the radio character Seth Parker, is fulfilling a lifetime ambition by sailing completely around the world. Early in December, vast crowds on the historic wharves of Portland, Maine, Governor Louis J. Braun and the entire Maine Legislature which adjourned especially for the purpose, cheered the good ship "Seth Parker" as it set sail with its crew of twenty-five men for a year and a half of adventurous voyaging. Yes, set sail! For the vessel is a four masted schooner, a modernized reincarnation of the sailing ships that color the life of the fictitious "Cap'n Seth" and his seafaring friends.

A Varied Larder

While it retains the picturesque old beauty of the ships of other days, the "Seth Parker" is a marvel of modern equipment as far as its kitchen is concerned. In addition to the tons of fresh foods stowed in its hold it has no less than fifty-five different kinds of canned foods, including such vegetables as baked beans, beets, black eye peas, boiled onions, carrots, mixed vegetables, peas, red beans, red kidney beans, soaked limas, stringless beans, succotash and sweet corn.

The canned fruits include apple sauce, apricots, blueberries, cherries, peaches, pears, pineapple and sliced apples; the meats corned beef, corn beef hash and frankfurters; the fish canned sea food, codfish cakes and lobster; and the soups asparagus, celery, clam chowder, pea, tomato and vegetable.

In addition to these there are a varied assortment of necessities and luxuries in cans such as brown bread, condensed milk, coffee in vacuum packed cans, evaporated milk, French dressing, honey, horseradish, lobster spread, loganberry juice, mayonnaise, mincemeat, peanut butter, pickles, relish spread, tea, tomato juice and vegetable shortening.

Boston Baked Beans in Borneo

The expedition will need all these, for its itinerary, after leaving America, will include Trinidad, Rio, Buenos Aires, Capetown, Madagascar, Ceylon, Rangoon, Mandalay, Siam, Singapore, Java, the Dutch East Indies, Borneo, Bali, Australia, New Guinea, New Zealand, the Fiji Islands, Solomon Islands, Hawaii, the South Sea Islands, Galapagos and Panama. Then it will sail back up the Atlantic coast.

If, when in Borneo, the crew of the Seth Parker is seized with a longing for Boston Baked Beans, the ship's cook will then be able to produce them. And with them may be served real New England steamed brown bread, also ready at hand in a can. Or if, in far off Madagascar, they have a hankering for apple sauce of the kind that Mother Parker makes in her neat kitchen, their wish can be granted, once more from a can.

Thanks to modern canners the crew of the Seth Parker can feast in the farthest corners of the earth on delicacies, not to mention such necessities to health as the wide variety of fruits and vegetables that contain the all-important vitamins. And all of these edibles will remain fresh until opened in spite of time, temperature, wind or weather.

A Vast Difference in Diet

How amazed an able seaman who shipped before the mast in the old whaling days would be to see such foods appear at "mess." In one of the fascinating tales of life on the rolling deep in the forties, and fifties—"Wooden Ships and Iron Men" by Frederick William Wallace—we find the following description of the fare of that time:

"The usual fare was mouldy beef, salt-struck until it was as tough as leather, fat salt pork not fit for slushing the launching ways, hard bread or sea biscuit made of flour which had the flintiness of Portland cement, a beverage not exactly tea and not exactly coffee, which the men called 'bush grass and mahogany sawdust,' dried peas softened slightly by an enormous amount of soda and a pea soup manufactured from gravelly. Molasses was used as a sweetener for everything. Gobs of boiled dough called 'duff' was a special treat once or twice a week."

After years of such a diet, sailors must indeed have felt that they deserved the name of "old salt." It was in those times, and after, that the British ships were called "lime juicers" because they were required by law to serve lime juice to the crew to prevent scurvy, as much a hazard to early sailors as icebergs and tropical monsoons. But now, thanks to the modern canning industry, the dread scurvy has been driven off the sea.*

Better Breakfasts

IZAAK WALTON, who in the year 1673 told the world about a fisherman's joys in an inimitable little book called "The Compleat Angler," speaks of enjoying a "good, honest, wholesome, hungry breakfast." Try saying these words to yourself in your first waking moments. There's an enticing kind of magic about them, isn't there?

"A Good Honest Wholesome Hungry Breakfast"

But words aren't necessary to plant the promise of breakfast in your half conscious head. Muffins growing golden brown in the oven have a way of sending out a fragrant invitation that reaches the sleepiest brain. And who could fail to heed the urgent R.S.V.P. of coffee? Its rich comforting odor is the best alarm clock of all, especially since vacuum packing now brings it to your coffee pot as fresh as the hour it was roasted.

Here's a modern version of just the kind of breakfast Izaak Walton preferred:

Iced Pineapple Juice
Cold Cereal with Cream
French Lamb Chops
New Potatoes in Cream
Whole Wheat Prune Muffins
Coffee

Whole Wheat Prune Muffins: Beat one egg, add half a can of evaporated milk and half a cup of prune juice. Add one and a third cups of whole wheat flour and two-thirds of a cup of sifted white flour, four teaspoons of baking powder, two tablespoons of sugar, and three-quarters of a teaspoon of salt. Add two tablespoons of butter and two-thirds of a cup of chopped stewed prunes. Bake for about twenty minutes in a 400 degree oven. This makes twelve muffins.*

Poem

Down within the deep, dark forest
And across the river side
Stands a low and humble dwelling
Were the nature things preside.
Flowers bloom around its doorstep,
Roses and for-get-me-nots,
And the birps which sing so sweetly
Dwell in nature's sacred spot
Are the woodlands all around you
Twined with flowers bright and fair?
Do your thoughts, which turn to nature
Memories of this dwelling bear?

Just a Little Smile

TIME NOT WASTED

The irate parent stormed up and down the room before the nervous-looking young man.

"What, sir!" he shouted. "You have the nerve to come to my office to ask for my daughter? Well, I might as well tell you that you could have saved yourself the journey."

The suitor sighed wearily.

"Well, that's all right, sir," he said. "You see, I had another message to deliver in the same building."

Old Nick Was Spry

A man caught a boy in his garden stealing apples and handed him to the police.

As it was the boy's first offense, the judge let him off, but told him never to yield to such temptation again, adding: "Ye should have flown from the evil one."

"So I did, sir," replied the boy, "but he caught me before I got over the fence!"—Border Cities Star.

Honest, Anyway

Woman—My husband is a perfect brute, and I am going to get a divorce.

Visiting Gentleman Friend—Why, I thought he was a pretty square sort of fellow.

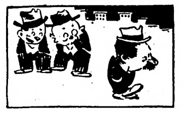
Woman—He may be square, but I don't want him around. He thinks it is more important to pay the grocer than to buy the clothes I want. —Chelsea Record.

Beginning of Property

"I suppose winning money from that tenderfoot was like taking candy from a child."

"Just about," replied Three-finger Sam; "assumin' you have noticed what a howling fuss any kid kin put up if you try to grab his confectionery." —Philanderer Johnson in the Washington Star.

CHANGEABLE



"What a fickle-mind he is!"

"Has to be. He's in the weather bureau."

Again the Spotlight

"Are you sure the country will come out all right?"

"Absolutely," answered Senator Sorghum.

"Then why all this argument?"

"As usual in every seeming crisis, there has to be an argument about who's going to get the credit for saving it."

First Come, First Served

Profitable Play

"We're going out to play," announced the oldest boy.

"Don't go climbing trees over in Benson's orchard," said the practical housewife. "It's time enough to tear your trousers when the apples are ripe."

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spreed. Learning of Polaris' dire straits, and hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters. He finds Frans, a scoundrel, plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew, by lucky chance, assumes that he is Flynn's son, and he does not disillusion them. Steve takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of beautiful Kate Flynn, which Steve finds, immensely increases his desire to aid Old Jim. He learns MacDonald, eccentric old Scotsman, holds timber vital to the Polaris interests.

Steve decided to watch LaFane closely. Just now he was chaining some setters and, after a moment, with a final playful toss of the youngest child, set off into the woods with two bird dogs. After he went, a great, gray creature that had been pacing at his chain length while LaFane sat on the bench, but which lay flat, head on his paws, while the man was near, rose to his feet. He resumed that restless pacing, back and forth, back and forth, watching the children with ears stiff. . . .

For another hour Steve and McNally talked and might have continued so until noon had not a shrill, long-drawn scream brought them to their feet.

Steve was first to the window. He saw LaFane's three children on the beach, walking toward the store, the youngest with a hand held by each of the others. The scream came again and they turned and saw what Drake saw, a huge, wolf-like dog, a length of chain attached to his collar curling and snapping behind him, racing along the sand, head low, the hair along his back on end.

A man appeared in the doorway of the store, looked out and whirled back. The children stood still an instant and then the eldest, with a frightened cry, tugged at the baby's hand and ran for sanctuary.

"Come on!" cried Drake. "Get a gun, Mac!"

He vaulted out the window and ran to intercept the dog but he could not cover the distance rapidly enough. He could hear the ragged roar in the animal's throat as he swerved a bit to circle the quarry, could see the orange glitter in his eyes and the flicker of saliva on his lips.

"Hi!" he yelled in a voice sharp with fear. "Hi, you!"

He might as well have whispered to the winds of heaven!

The children had stopped, were huddled together as the dog, lashing with his fangs at the youngest, ripping a slash in her dress but evidently missing flesh, went past, whirling to a stop. His feet clawed in the wet sand for hold to turn and be at them again.

The man reappeared in the store doorway, rifle butt against his cheek.

"Don't shoot!" Steve cried. "Don't—"

No need of that warning; the man saw that he could not send a saving bullet without grave danger of having it injure the child. He came down the steps, limping badly, and hobbled forward.

The largest girl, sweeping the others behind her protectingly, stooped, scooped her hands full of pebbles and sand and as the dog rushed her, fangs bared, flung the grit full in his face.

It drove him, blinking and raging, from his course, made his rush harmless and gave Steve Drake time to close in.

No more than time. The dog leaped for the baby and bore her down. The teeth had missed a hold but Steve saw blood on the child's cheek where a paw had raked, as he raised a foot for the kick that lifted the animal, spun him about and threw him clear of the little girl.

"Pick her up! Get her away! Run!" he shouted to the largest, stamping and kicking at the dog.

His toe caught the beast on the point of the nose as he leaped in to accept this challenge. With a short yelp the creature backed away, circling, and Steve, not taking his eyes from him, stooped and seized a stout hardwood stick which lay on the sand.

The dog had forgotten the running children, evidently. He circled the man, jaws drooling, eyes fixed. Steve, turning as the dog moved, braced himself for the rush which he knew would come.

When it did come it was with that suddenness which only a creature with the wild in his blood could summon. He hurtled straight at the man.

With a grunt, Drake put the whole of his strength into the blow. The club caught the animal along the ribs, knocked the breath from him in a belching grunt and sent him rolling.

He went over twice, chain wrapping about his body, and even though the man closed quickly, raining blows, he scuttled free and circled briefly at a safe distance.

Once again he rushed, hurling his hundred pounds of fury through the air, straight for Steve's throat. This time the club caught him atop the skull and he went down with a yelp.

The limping individual with the rifle was close, shouting, his weapon at his shoulder.

"Put up that gun!" Steve snapped. "You'll get me—"

He struck at the dog's back, but the animal threw himself sideways, going with the blow and, scuttling a few feet to safety, whirled again.

"Now!" panted McNally, coming with a gun himself. "Get back! I'll fix him!"

"Let him alone," said Drake, lifting his eyes just long enough to see the children disappearing into the doorway of the store, to see their mother, who had run past him, close behind them. "This seems to be a kind of personal matter."

Indeed it was. The look in the dog's eyes was of such unmistakable hatred, so intense, so personal that it carried a direct challenge.

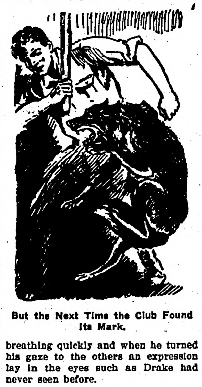
Again a rush, but this time the animal feinted, went under the swinging club and slashed at Steve's thigh as he passed. The fangs missed by inches. But the next time the club found its mark, blood slavered from the dog's lip and he backed off slowly, grudgingly until Drake, setting his foot on the dragging chain, checked his retreat.

Steve walked down that chain with the precision of a tightrope walker, keeping his full weight always on it, and the dog, digging his feet into the sand, strained backward with all his strength, throwing his head from side to side as he sought to tear free. . . .

The animal was belly down, now, and Drake raised the club high. One fair blow on the skull and—

"Let me take him," said a voice close behind.

LaFane was looking at the great beast, face unperturbed, but he was breathing quickly and when he turned his gaze to the others an expression lay in the eyes such as Drake had never seen before.



But the Next Time the Club Found Its Mark.

"What you were going to do would spoil my chance," he said quietly.

"Chance?" Steve demanded incredulously. "Chance for what?"

"To save myself in the eyes of my children, perhaps. Let him go . . . please."

Amazed, Drake hesitated; then took his weight from the chain. The dog turned to skulk away, licking his chops.

LaFane spoke: "Duke!" The word was crisp and sharp, not loud. "Come in!"

The animal hesitated, stopped; the tail dropped between his legs, he lowered his head in shame or fear.

"Come in!" his owner insisted and snapped his thumb. Slowly, then, belly to the sand, the dog slunk toward him.

"Good Lord, man, are you going to keep that thing around after what almost happened?"

"Yes," said LaFane. "And because of what almost happened." He searched Drake's face and his mouth twitched. "If I killed him before I made him safe for them, what would the children think of me?"

Steve scratched his head.

"Well, that's one way to look at it," he muttered. "But what . . ."

LaFane, evidently, was not interested in what Drake had been about to ask.

"Heel!" he said and started for the store, dog close behind.

He did not look at the creature again. The children and his wife were in the doorway, the woman trying to still the frantic crying of the youngest.

The man brushed her aside, almost roughly. He took the babe in his hands and held her out before him. Then, with a quick movement, he crushed her close, putting his cheek to her scratched cheek, wrapping his arms about her.

He started off for his home as others approached. The dog slunk at his heels. As he passed, Drake saw that tears were on the man's face.

"A queer one, for sure," he said, thinking of McNally's words.

That afternoon Steve found LaFane in the store.

"I want to send a telegram in to town," he said. "Can you start early in the morning?"

"I will start now," he said.

"That's fine of you but it isn't necessary."

"Anything you want of me I will do, Young Jim," LaFane said quietly. "If you had not been here . . ." He shrugged. "I have you to thank for something which is priceless."

He went out abruptly and Steve felt that in those few words he had conveyed as much feeling as most men could in an oration.

The message which Steve sent out, addressed to Katharine Flynn, was as follows:

"Am on job. Situation bad but nothing is impossible. Don't expect letters until I have something to report. Jim."

He had experienced some qualms about the signature, but it had to be. No concern would be content to know that a stranger held its destinies in his hands and he knew that the truth would be the last straw for the burden which Old Jim and his daughter bore.

Immediately, he commenced informing himself of the Polaris holdings. He went to inspect the proposed route of the railroad, temporarily, at least, blocked. He looked over other possible routes; all, he agreed, were out of the question because of the nature of the terrain.

"It looks," he told himself, "as though we'll have to beat either Franz or this other man, MacDonald."

On the fourth day, after meeting with Wartin and the wood-choppers and conceding to their demands, feeling guilty at spending another's money and yet bolstered by the knowledge that it was the only way out, Steve set out to inspect the lower river.

McNally was busy and Steve, wanting some one familiar with the country along, asked LaFane to go in the canoe with him.

For a mile no word was spoken. Then LaFane said, "This is the Laird's line."

Steve was wondering about the owner and how he might be approached when they shot around a sharp bend, coming from strong current to a quiet, velvety pool.

It was a surprise to see another canoe there, and a sort of shock to observe Franz in the stern, holding it in the shallows by a paddle against bottom. A decided shock, however, to meet the peculiarly angered glare turned on him by the white-haired mountain of a man who sat in the bow, a fly rod in his huge hands.

"Thanks!" was his first word, spoken bitterly. "Thanks, Meester LaFane 'nd yer companion! Thanks fer puttin' doon th' grandest fish that swims th' stream!"

Steve turned the canoe quickly into the shallows and brought it to a halt.

"I'm sorry, sir!" he said. "We couldn't see around the bend. I didn't know—"

"See! Know! What gude'd it've done, had ye? What gude to me, I'd choose to know!" His gray eyes burned.

"I wouldn't have done it for the world, sir!" Steve protested. "I knew what it is myself, to work over a fish."

"Ay! Wi' spinner, likely! Most yoong men use th' spinner. They're not anglers; it takes an angler to ken!"

"Yes," Steve agreed. "A spinner fisherman, a plunker wouldn't understand. For them, a fish is meat. For the dry fly . . . He's something else again. I'm sorry. Come on, LaFane."

He spun the canoe about and they proceeded. He was conscious that the Scotchman was eyeing him, something like puzzlement evidently mingling with his ill humor.

LaFane spoke after a time:

"It's little things that touch him off . . . or win his friendship. Likely, he won't speak to you for months."

They rounded a bend or two and the voice of the river became a mutter.

"We stop here," LaFane said. "That's Twenty Mile rapid below us. A man don't run it unless he has to. And then, only some get through."

They beached at a trail and stepped out. A sharp bend was below and following the narrow ledge of rocks, they moved along to where they could see the beginning of the rapid. Steve shrugged as he surveyed the rock-strewn torrent.

"Franz did it once," LaFane said, as though sensing what his companion's shrug indicated. "Two years ago. It's what got him into good standing with MacDonald. MacDonald couldn't do it even in his younger days, and he was a good man, too. Some men are like that: they'll have nothing to do with any other until he can beat them at something they're good in. Franz is no fool."

Steve thought this last might have been added as a warning. And he thought again that this companion was a strange creature.

The Laird was not in sight on their return and when they came to the pool where his great trout lived Steve called a halt and sat there for many minutes, peering down into the dark water. It was a superb lair for a big fish, presenting hazards which would put the best of anglers to a disadvantage. For some time they remained there, moving up and down while Steve, though saying little, studied the character of the bend.

As they entered Good-Bye lake again LaFane, apropos of nothing at all, said:

"Old Jim left a fly rod and tackle here two years ago. I have fresh leaders."

"Thanks," muttered Steve and grinned. This fellow was good!

GOOD ADVICE AS TO IMPROVEMENT OF ROADSIDES

Local materials for roadside improvement can be utilized at a comparatively low cost, says Wilbur H. Simonson, landscape architect of the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture. Such materials include boulders or native stone for guard rails, suitable plant material salvaged in the path of construction operations, trees and undergrowth carefully trimmed in contrast with haphazard cutting, and other such objects naturally adapted to the landscape.

The use of approved landscape and horticultural specifications for trees and plants for roadside improvements is the best safeguard in the planning and execution of roadside improvements, says Mr. Simonson. Co-operation between all parties engaged in planning the work is necessary to insure final harmony and attractive results.

For the price of a single mile of highgrade road surface 30 miles of roadside can be improved. This estimate by Mr. Simonson is based on plant materials obtained through fair competitive bids, unified control of highway building so that construction scars are avoided, side slopes graded during construction operations to fit landscape requirements, and the salvaging of valuable tree growth.

Mr. Simonson calls attention to the importance of parking places, spring outlets, railings, and other such features that the motorist sees and enjoys which are not necessarily more expensive when attractively developed.

The Boy or Girl Who Refuses to Eat

"What have I ever done to deserve a child who refuses to eat, and is just skin and bones?" The mother who asks that question might be surprised to learn that she alone is to blame. She knows a lack of appetite is the sign of a clogged system, but does the wrong thing to remedy the condition. A violent cathartic that upsets the stomach pulls down a child like a spell of sickness. It often forms the laxative habit. A more sensible way of regulating children is explained in the column to the right:

It's a lucky girl whose mother knows how to regulate her children's bowels without some strong, evil-tasting cathartic that upsets the system and ruins their appetite! Wingless Birds That Have Been Wiped Out

Madagascar, in past ages, harbored some of the largest wingless birds, one being the aepyornis. Marco Polo mentions a huge bird seen on these islands and called it the roc. Some think that he saw one of the last live specimens of this fearsome aepyornis. Although not so tall as the moa, being about seven feet in height, it laid a gigantic egg, fossil remains of which have been found in the bogs. There is one in the British museum over two and a half feet round its long axis, with a capacity of nearly three gallons!

Imagine a bird standing nearly nine feet in height with a head as large as that of a horse, and with a powerful hooked beak. This was the phororhacos. It must have had the speed of a racehorse, for its victims were evidently run down and rapidly slaughtered with the powerful mandibles. It was found in South America.

When early explorers visited Madagascar they found the dodo and solitaire roaming the plains, but the gun marked the doom of these fine birds which were really huge wingless pigeons. A live specimen was brought to this country and exhibited in London; its stuffed remains may still be seen in Oxford.—London Answers.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

President Roosevelt Asks Congress to Provide for 12 Banks to Help Small Trade—Mussolini Predicts World Fascist Era in 60 Years—Rickenbacker Causes Stir.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, in a letter to the senate and house banking committees, asked congress to set up twelve industrial credit banks which he had been told would safeguard the jobs of 846,000 persons and create work for 378,000 more. Immediately after the President's wishes were known legislation was introduced in both houses giving the federal reserve system authority to create the banks, financing them by selling $140,000,000 of stock to the treasury.

The plight of the "small or medium size" industrialist was stressed by the President, and he cited results of a survey indicating that such industry was badly in need of $700,000,000 working capital.

The President asked for "early consideration" of his proposal, pointing out that the situation called for "immediate relief."

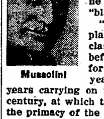
The President's letter to Chairmen Fletcher and Steagall of the senate and house banking committees said the proposed banks would be controlled by directorates a majority of which will themselves be industrialists. Mr. Roosevelt said:

"I have been deeply concerned with the situation in our small industries. In numberless cases their working capital has been lost or seriously depleted.

"We have afforded much aid in the recovery of agriculture, commerce, our larger industries and our financial institutions, and our improved condition nationally furnishes full justification for these efforts. We must continue in behalf of the medium size man in industry and commerce."

The credit banks proposed in the bills introduced would be chartered by the existing Federal Reserve banks and be operated subject to the regulations of the reserve board. They would set up branches.

SPEAKING before an assembly of 5,000 cheering chief Fascists Premier Mussolini outlined a 60-year program of internal and external expansion which, he predicted, would in the Twenty-first century give Italy the "primacy of the world." That century, he said, will be a "black shirt era."



Mussolini

"In this age of plans," Il Duce declared, "I want to lay before you a plan not for five years or ten years but for 60 years carrying on to the Twenty-first century, at which time Italy will have the primacy of the world.

"Italy has no future in the West and North. Her future lies to the East and South in Asia and Africa. The vast resources of Africa must be valorized and Africa brought within the civilized circle.

"I do not refer to conquest of territory but to natural expansion. We demand that nations which have already arrived in Africa do not block at every step Italian expansion."

Here, it was said, he was referring particularly to France.

Internally, Mussolini said, immediate objectives are completion of swamp reclamation by 1940, new aqueducts and highways, plans to recreate Italian municipalities, complete rebuilding of 500,000 rural houses and repairs to 930,000 rural houses, a work of 30 years.

"Every rural person will have a clean and healthy house," he asserted. "Only in this way can the rush to the city be combated."

In the midst of a pandemonium of applause Mussolini said Fascism "became universal in 1929."

"But in this phenomenon," he continued, "it is necessary to distinguish positive from negative Fascism. Positive Fascism knows how to destroy the old and rebuild the new, whereas negative Fascism knows only how to destroy."

SECRETARY MORGENTHAU reported to President Roosevelt that income tax receipts for the first quarter of the year were well above estimates and far more than a year ago.

Payments to the close of business March 15, the day when all returns were due, were $147,794,000. In announcing this figure on the basis of telegraphic reports from collectors, the treasury said corresponding collections last year were $99,847,000.

In 1933, however, the date for filing returns was extended from March 15 to March 31, after the bank holiday.

Treasury estimates of income tax payments for March are $250,000,000 as compared with $174,000,000 last March.

A DEMAND by Col. Edward V. Rickenbacker, famous war ace, that President Roosevelt "purge his official family of traitorous members" who advised him to cancel air mail contracts, threw the senate post office committee into an uproar Saturday.

Chairman McKeller charged Rickenbacker with making a "political speech" and accused him of "attacking the President." Rickenbacker replied: "I am not attacking the President. It is my confidence in him that I do not want destroyed."

Rickenbacker's statements came extemporaneously after reading a prepared statement denouncing cancellation of contracts as "unfair and un-American," and after cross-examination, arising from the witness chair, he declared cancellation had "caused doubt in the minds of millions of Americans." He continued:

"It is the doubt in the minds of millions whether all the President has so ably accomplished, such as the NRA, CWA, gold content and others, has been proven or has had time to be proven, or whether they are as big a mistake as the cancellation of the air-mail contracts; whether tomorrow that also may be questionable."

Rickenbacker agreed with Lindbergh and Chamberlin that a federal aviation commission should be named to take charge of the industry at once and that the proposed bill is "destructive to industry."

TRACTS urging the public to donate cash to promote the sport of flying in Germany were circulated in Berlin Sunday. Under the Versailles treaty public funds are not permitted to be used to stimulate aviation, but the leaflet points out that the treaty does not refer to private initiative, and adds:

Premier Goering

"We are unable to construct military planes, but the development of the sport of flying and training German people as flyers is entirely dependent upon ourselves and our readiness to make sacrifices."

The demand for a German air force was also emphasized by Gen. Hermann Wilhelm Goering, premier of Prussia and reichsminister of aviation, in speaking at a flying exhibition at the Essen airport. Goering declared that Germany can enjoy no security, no peace, no equality until she is granted the right to defend herself in the air. This demand cannot be altered, the air minister proclaimed.

"If other countries are permitted the heaviest weapons of attack in the air, Germany at least must be given the right of defense," he said.

SAMUEL INSULL, fugitive utilities magnate, is, at this writing, somewhere on the high seas aboard his chartered freighter Maiotis, bound for an unknown asylum. The Maiotis is the boat on which Insull made his secret escape from Greece, and which was ordered to return by the authorities when his absence from his hotel in Athens was discovered. Later he was given permission to depart.

Reports are vague as to his destination. Some say he is bound for Abyssinia and that he would find refuge there from the indictments returned against him in Chicago.

An Athens lawyer who has represented Insull denied that Abyssinia was the goal, but he would not suggest any alternative. His reticence was attributed to fears that a kidnap plot was being laid to snatch Insull from his slow-moving ship on the high seas.

On the other hand, friends of the fugitive in his seventeen-month fight against extradition to the United States said that the Maiotis might remain at sea until April 20 "or perhaps longer."

THE Bankhead compulsory cotton control bill, designed to stabilize cotton prices, passed the house Monday. This measure would limit production in the coming cotton year to 10,000,000 bales and levy a tax of 50 per cent of the market value on staple produced in excess of quotas allocated to producers.

AFTER being grounded for eight days following a series of crashes that killed ten men in twenty-two days, United States army pilots took to the air again with the mail on Monday.

Precautions to put planes and men into safest possible condition have been taken by army officials. Blind and night flying equipment has been installed in planes. Two-way radio facilities have been put into planes on transcontinental routes, and soon will be in all planes in mail service.

Under the new setup the army will cover about 40 per cent of the route mileage formerly flown by the commercial lines, according to Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, chief of the air corps.

PRESIDENT AND MRS. ROOSEVELT celebrated the twenty-ninth anniversary of their wedding with a quiet family dinner in the White House. It was strictly a family affair, just as the event 29 years ago was strictly a family affair. A few intimate friends were invited over for dinner. Mrs. James Roosevelt, eighty-two-year-old mother of the President, came down from her home in New York. Other immediate members of the family were also present.

The White House was flooded with messages from all over the country, with flowers from close friends.

How to Enjoy New Leisure?

Decreased Hours of Labor Should Mean Time Spent Advantageously, Not Merely Opportunity for Aimlessly Passing One's Time.

One of the most talked of subjects at the present time, is this New Leisure. Not only is it a greatly discussed matter, but careful plans are in process of development whereby leisure hours will be well-spent hours. It all comes into the limelight because of the shortened laboring hours. Sometimes the decrease in working hours means a shorter workday, in which case the leisure hours in a week are divided daily. Sometimes the usual daily hours remain as formerly, and a day off in each week is given employees. In both cases, leisure hours, such as have never before come to the working man, whether in high or low positions, are now at his command.

What, then, is to be the result of this New Leisure? Will it mean loafing at home or about the streets? Or will it mean time devoted to healthy exercise, the development of some study for which, previously, there has been no opportunity? In other words, will the time be mis-spent or well-spent? What are individuals going to do about it?

Hitherto the one common bond between persons of all ranks and positions has been shortage of time. The most universal expression has been "I have no time"—to do whatever is talked about, whether reading, community work, study of some special subject, even the making of calls on loved friends. There has been no time for anything beyond and apart from a daily routine of work interspersed with certain church or club activities, of which latter cards are the most time-engrossing.

It is a matter to give pause to one's thoughts, the suddenness of this New Leisure, and what it may mean for good or bad in a community. No longer can persons who come under the regime of shortened laboring hours complain that they "have no time." They will have time on their hands to do with what they will.

In the home, it will make a great difference whether the man or woman uses the enforced leisure advantageously or merely to loaf around aimlessly. Trouble will be in the offing unless the hours are enjoyed in needed rest, or in such work as the person has craved time for, in sports of a healthy sort, etc. The leisure may prove a binding of harmony in the home or it may prove disrupting. Just how it should be spent, is for each person to decide. However, it should not be given over to unworthy loafing, but to some pursuit pleasantly engrossing enough to make life increasingly worth living.

New Intelligence Test May Be Size of Feet

"Give me men who are big-footed men, and I will show you a bunch of men who can carry the mail in any sport." Such is said to be the slogan of Bert Munhall, athletic trainer of Carnegie Tech in Pittsburgh. Mr. Munhall's idea, according to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which calls attention to his theory, is that "the boy with big pedal extremities has an advantage to start, not so much because of his big feet per se as because, normally, big feet are a direct outgrowth of having done a lot of walking, and a lot of walking implies that the walker has had a lot of exercise, with the strong and supple muscles that grow with exercise. They are an earmark of health and soundness and alertness."

Well, Lincoln and Washington had big feet, although they were big men in every way. The St. Louis paper suggests that big feet are a sign of stamina, co-ordination and physical alertness. "Why should not the same symbol be of important testimony for the selection of doers in any of the arts or sciences?" Perhaps foot-measuring will be added to the intelligence tests one of these days.—Literary Digest.

The Bird Has Speed

At widely separated points on the prairies, says Nature Magazine, you find outcrops of sandstone, forming cliffs or buttes, and here you are sure to find in the portholes or on ledges the brick-red eggs of that most splendid of all our birds of prey—the prairie falcon. A bird of marvelous speed and indomitable courage, this little falcon typifies the wild freedom of the Great Plains. Less frequently you come upon the eyries of the majestic golden eagle. The nests, which are often used for generations, are added to, year after year, until the material composing them would fill the body of a wagon.

HIS TEACHER SAYS HE ACTS LIKE A DIFFERENT BOY!
I'M DOING FINE NOW, DAD

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN © The Safety Man

Do you know that almost two-thirds of all the automobile accidents of 1933 were due to some degree to driving errors? People made mistakes. Some of these mistakes are entirely uncalled for.

Exceeding the speed limits resulted in the greatest number of deaths. It stands to reason that the faster you go the more chance you have of an accident. It also stands to reason that when you do hit an object at a terrific rate of speed, the chances are increased.

Most of these accidents are due because the conditions are not right. Roads might be slippery; hills obstruct vision; shoulders of cement roads might be slippery, muddy, and soft; numerous other conditions make for possibility of serious injuries at excessive speed.

We insist on raising the rates of speed and insist on better roads, but no mention is made of increasing the standard requirements of driving. It should be done.

This is the first land deal that has been made around here so far this year.

Clifford W. Bouvette, Hallock, Democratic candidate for Congress from this district will speak over WDAY, the Fargo station at 7:40 p. m. on Tuesday, April 17.

Mr. Bouvette is of the opinion that he understands the underlying principles that have caused this great depression. He thinks this depression has been caused from conditions that will not be righted until such time as we legislate so as to do away with them and prevent their reoccurance. He claims to have an entirely new angle thru which the depression may be viewed, and he challenges anyone to disprove a single statement he will make in his radio address.

Many Attend Phone Meeting

About fifty farmers and business men attended the annual meeting of the Farmers & Village Switchboard company here on Monday evening.

C. A. Davis was elected as a representative of the north line; Wm. Paskewitz of the east line and Fred Steinhauer of the Excel line. T. B. Folden is secretary-treasurer of the company.

Many opinions were voiced by telephone subscribers as to what they figured would be the only solution for keeping the telephone system here going.

After much discussion it was voted that the subrscibers rates should be raised. The new rate to be $8.00 per year for a farm, $16.00 a year for a business phone and $8.00 a year for a residence phone in town where the subscriber is a shareholder in the line.

This rate takes the place of the old rate of $5 for a farm and $12 for a business phone. The new rate to take effect from the 1st of April this year. It was also decided that under the new rate the company would repair the lines. Under the old rate it was up to each telephone owner to do his own line repair. However, all those, who will have a phone, must pay for the repair and batteries for the instrument.

It was not made clear as to who should pay such repairs on phones in town where the subscriber is not a shareholder and rents the phone complete from the company.

Power was given the board to accept 50 per cent of all the old outstanding telephone dues as payment in full. If you owe $5 you can settle for $2.50. This is understood that you pay all of the 50 per cent in one year, and also the new dues.

The company is going on a cash basis and from now on those who do not want to settle up, will be cut off of the line and their account charged against their share. If you elect this course then you can not get hooked on again unless all your old accounts are settled in full.

Now you all know that for the $3 raise in rates, you can't expect rebuilt lines. If the company can get a man to go out to do this then he too must get his pay out of the $3. Some parts of all the lines in the country need stretches of new wire and new poles and most of the old poles reset.

The network in the village needs a complete overhaul according to the looks of it.

According to a report at the meeting it was pointed out that there are only about fifty phones active at this time. With seven of these paying $16 and the rest $8, you can soon figure the income from which to pay a repair man and an operator at the local exchange. Can it be done?

Out of the $286.00 outstanding dues of which the company will take half as full pay, they expect to pap up outstaning debts.

Thomas Vollom, general manager of the Garden Valley telephone company was here and he gave some good advice as to how to try to keep going. He said that you must not expect too much until the system gets back in shape.

Lets see you all cooperate now and put this new deal over. You must pay up or it can't run

H. Moberg and Manvel Moe shipped a car of stock to So. St. Paul Saturday, Moe made the trip to the city.

Spring Is Around The Corner

There are now a lot of things that are coming along which are convincing us that we actually will soon see warmer weather. We have had small showers of rain, the robbins are here, the meadowlarks sing, the prairie chickens hum in the morning.

The grass is getting green in spots, the pocket gophers are digging, and there are a lot of other signs that show that old man winter is leaving.

Miss Anna Loven of Gatzke spent the week end at the home of Mr and Mrs. E. Loven here.

Rev. and Mrs. Redal and family spent Sunday visiting with relatives at Grand Forks.

Magnus Grondahl, pioneer farmer of Ringbo was taken very ill last Thursday and was rushed to the hospital in Thief River Falls where he is being treated for hemmorhage.

C. H. Gunheim has had the interior of his store completely redecorated with a coat of white paint. Hartley Peterson and Harland Gunheim did the work.

Mrs. Hjalmer Peterson and children, Mrs. C. A. Larson and children, Mrs. Sam Lorentson and children and Mrs. Leo Horien spent Sunday afternoon at the H. O. Hanson home.

Miss Esther Hagberg was taken suddenly ill on Friday with a case of chronic appendicitis and had to be rushed to the St. Lukes hospital in Thief River Falls where she was operated on that afternoon. She is reported as getting along fine.

Natures's Ways

The Earth's green grassy woodlands,
All are of nature's part
In making this grand world of ours
A place for human hearts.

Indeed it is quite beautiful
To see woodlands green
With all its trees and flowers
That develop like a dream.

Let's cooperate with nature,
To make a happy home.
For all of Nature's lovers,
Whom her woodlands love to roam.

STRANGE, BUT TRUE

"Can't say that I have," said the latter. "They are certainly rather embarrassing at times."

Freeman nodded pensively.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Learning of Polaris' dire straits, and hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters. He finds Franz, a scoundrel, plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew, by lucky chance, assumes that he is Flynn's son, and he does not disillusion them, taking charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate Flynn, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. MacDonald, eccentric old Scotsman, holds timber vital to the Polaris interests. Steve gains the warm friendship of LaFane, queer woods scout.

CHAPTER IV

It was difficult in those first days always to present a front devoid of surprise when addressed as Jim, always to answer promptly when some man called, "Oh, Jim!" always to remember that he was supposed to know more than any other there knew about the Polaris situation. But, somehow, he managed to play up convincingly to the role he had assumed.

He and McNally walked in to Shoestring to see a lawyer, one of the two in town. They conferred with the other who, they learned, was representing Franz, and determined that there was no hope of a quick and reasonable settlement of the right-of-way stalemate there.

Whatever the reasons Franz might have in mind, whatever his relationships with unfriendly competitors might be, he surely was a factor to be considered, Steve realized.

Where the man headquartered, he did not know. He had seen him only twice since arriving at Good-Bye: on that first night when he fought him down and, again, when he encountered him with the Laird on the lower river. Frequently he heard others speak of having seen Franz here or there and always it was with the manner of men mentioning a person of consequence despite the fact that Drake had quite broken the fellow's influence with the crew.

But another encounter with Franz to add to the already heavy burden of his animosity for the man known as Young Jim was in the cards, it appeared.

Stopping at the headquarters store early one day for tobacco, Steve saw an aged, wasted Indian seated on the doorstep.

Old Tim Todd was busy selling goods to an Indian girl and as Steve stepped behind the counter to help himself, his interest was caught by her appearance.

Her racially flat face was a fine oval and the light bronze skin like satin. Her large eyes were widely set and they held on Steve as his gaze ran her body, still slender but with those voluptuous lines that are forerunners of the grossness which would accrue with years. A lovely young animal, he was thinking, as he reached for the can of tobacco, and then looked back into her face again.

She was staring at him and something like scorn and pride and affront showed in her eyes. He had the conviction that she had surmised his admiration and had put upon it the usual construction.

"Mary, I ain't got any green," Tom Todd said, turning from the shelf on which he kept his scant stock of dyes.

"Give me blue and yellow," the girl replied. "I make green."

She spoke with the broad vowel values usual in Indians and also with the careful inflection of one who has been schooled in a language other than their own, and turned her back on Steve, he thought, with conscious purpose.

He went out smiling sardonically. These Indian girls, he told himself, probably were justified in suspecting the emotions behind the stares of white men.

He paddled to the wood camp and was there until noon. Then, starting back, he encountered the Indians again. And with them, this time, was Franz.

Their two canoes, floating side by side, first attracted his attention. Then a glistening paddle blade flashed in the sunlight as the old man swung it. Franz whose back was turned upstream so he could not see Drake's approach, ducked, grasped the paddle and pulled his canoe closer to the other, gesticulating fiercely with his free hand.

His voice was not clearly distinguishable at first but in a moment, when Franz turned from berating the old man to address the girl, Steve heard him say:

"No more d—n foolishness! Hear that? You're going back to the farm now and stay there!"

The girl did not answer. She looked steadily at the man and deep anger smoldered in her face.

Franz wrested the paddle from the old native's hands and dropped it into his own canoe. Then, shoving himself along, he roughly grasped the girl's wrist.

"Going to do as I tell you without any fuss, or 've I got to herd you back like a pair of strayed sheep?" he demanded.

He twisted her arm and though her expression betrayed no feeling of pain Drake knew that it must hurt severely and he called out sharply:

"Let her go, Franz!"

The man turned abruptly. His eyes were pale against the angered flush of his face and when he saw Steve they flickered with confusion and his lower lip drooped.

"I'd let her go, if I were in your place," Steve repeated, bringing his canoe in against Franz's.

"My place? What place is that?"

"Well . . . right here beside me. Is that an answer?"

"What the h—l's this to you?"

"Not a great deal, except that you are hurting her. Let her go, I'm telling you! Didn't you get me the first time?"

Drake's words were thick with a quickly rising rage and he half lifted himself as though he would fall upon the other. Then, as Franz dropped the arm and hitched about to face him he added: "There! That's considerably better."

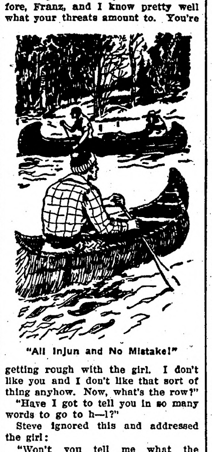
"If this is any of your d—d affair . . ." Franz began but Drake gave him no heed.

"What's the trouble?" he asked the girl.

Her eyes were fixed on him and both fright and suspicion showed in their depths. She gave her head a slight shake.

"Whatever it is, it's my business," Franz declared hotly, "and you won't come horning in if you know what's healthy for you."

"Healthy? For me?" Steve laughed derisively. "I took you on once before, Franz, and I know pretty well what your threats amount to. You're getting rough with the girl. I don't like you and I don't like that sort of thing anyhow. Now, what's the row?"



"All Injun and No Mistake!"

"Have I got to tell you in so many words to go to h—l?"

Steve ignored this and addressed the girl:

"Won't you tell me what the trouble is? There is trouble of some sort, of course. If you, too, say it's none of my affair I'll get going. But it seemed to me that, maybe, you could use a little help here and there."

He smiled encouragingly.

"We go to the Mad Woman," she answered simply. "My father is sick. He wants to be in the bush. He"—with a look at Franz—"tol' me not to go."

"That's it, eh? And is it . . . that is, has he any right to tell you what to do and make you do it?"

He thought that something like pride and, also, something kindred to shame showed in her face. She hesitated a moment and then said:

"No."

"That's a lie!" Franz cried. "Haven't I bought you two flour and pork? Where'd you've gotten those clothes you're wearing if it hadn't been for me? Where'd your seed for crops come from if I didn't furnish it this spring?"

"You got pay," the girl said and though she spoke dully—or perhaps because of it—and although her gaze simply smoldered, Steve read in those three short words the whole, sorry story.

"Why, you're crazy to take him into that country!" Franz burst out. "He's a sick man. He's got his ticket. The doctor told you that. Back in your shanty he'll keep warm and dry and have something to eat and if you go dragging him off into the bush he'll just lie down and never get up!"

The girl answered:

"Yes. He die. He know that. I know that. He wants to die in the bush, in a lodge. Not in any house. He wants that," she said again as if that want justified anything.

"Think I'm going to let you get away with that?" Franz demanded. "After holding you two up all this time, think I'm going to—"

"Hold on!" Steve snapped. "Let me talk a minute.

"Where've you been living?" he asked the girl. "Where is this shanty he talks about?"

"By Shoestring."

"Handy, eh?" Franz winced from the scorn in his question and Steve said to him: "Get on your way, Franz! . . . Beat it! Get away from these folks and let 'em alone to do as they please!"

He had let his canoe drift off but now shoved the bow between the other two craft.

"Get out!" he said, grasping the rails of the other canoes and shoving Franz's out into the current. "If you bother these people again I'll make it one of my jobs to run you over the horizon, you skunk!"

Until then Franz had make no comment; did not even remonstrate when Steven shoved at his canoe. But now, stung beyond discretion, perhaps, he taunted:

"Want her yourself? Want her—"

But as Drake drove his paddle deeply to be close and seize the man and retaliate for the insult, Franz grasped his own paddle and started rapidly down the river.

"You keep right on doing that!" Steve called, satisfied, though his voice still shook with just anger. "I'm going to keep a check on you with this pair and if you give 'em any trouble at all you'll think h—l's busted loose for sure on the Good-Bye!"

Sulkily, Franz paddled on and Drake turned toward the others. The girl was watching the departing canoe and although her face had the native stolidity he thought he could read in it, along with relief, the shadow of a shattered dream.

"I don't think he will bother you," he said, "but if he does— Do you know who I am?"

She did not answer; just averted her eyes.

"I'm at Good-Bye. You just ask there for Young Jim if he tries to make you any more trouble." He looked at the old man in the bow who, beyond any doubt, was desperately ill.

"Is it, after all, really a good thing to take him so far away when he's sick?"

"He wants to go," she replied simply.

"You've been to school, haven't you? I can tell from the way you talk."

"I was four winters at the sister's school."

"What's your name?"

"Mary Wolf."

"Well, Mary, wouldn't you be better off at home? I take it you've got some crops in."

"Some," she said. "He can't work corn now. I can. Not him. He don't like to stay home. He remembers how to make birch canoe. He likes that. He can make canoes 'til he die. He wants to go by the Mad Woman. Birch is good there."

"But how're you going to live? You haven't enough grub here to keep you going very long."

"Lots fish. Plenty rabbits," she answered.

Steve rubbed his chin. Certainly she was a beauty, he remarked to himself, and again realized that her eyes were on him as they had been in the store earlier that day. He had, too, the feeling that once more she detected his thoughts but this time, if that were true, she did not resent them.

The old man began to talk excitedly, looking and gesturing down the stream to where Franz had disappeared around a bend.

"What's he saying?"

"He says Franz took his paddle."

"Sure enough! Well . . . here, I've got two. Take this. Good luck, now, and if Franz follows you and starts bothering you again just get word to me."

To this, Mary made no response whatever. She did not thank him for the paddle nor for the aid he had rendered. She spoke a word to her father and dipped her blade and as though they had simply passed on their river journey went on.

"All Injun and no mistake!" Steve laughed to himself as he resumed his homeward way. But he did not laugh when his mind went back to Franz. He realized that McNally was right: that to give the man added reason for disliking him was to invite more trouble.

Back at headquarters, Steve went to LaFane's, got the fishing tackle the man had mentioned, paddled to the mouth of a creek below the store and, until dusk, took trout and pondered this and that.

He stopped at the store after dark and sat for some time on the steps talking with old Tim Todd. They spoke softly, but their voices carried in the still night. Almost any sound would travel far in that atmosphere and yet a canoe which had been lying behind a point while Steve fished made no sound as it passed the cluster of buildings.

After a time the man in the canoe ceased paddling and let the breath of a breeze carry him to the beach. He stepped out in the reeds and carefully drew his canoe in until it rested on bottom and then with great caution took the trail that led through the thicket to Steve's cabin. In his hand he carried a gun.

At a moss-grown boulder which the trail skirted, he paused, put down his gun, and rolled a rock to the trail; another, and still a third. He arranged them in a sort of nest, with meticulous care, and then took a ball of stout cord from his pocket and unwound it.

EXPEDITION FINDS ANTIOCH HOUSE 1,600 YEARS OLD

Archeologists have dug up a villa at Antioch that dates from 1,600 years ago. It has colonnades and mosaic pavements, along with domes decorated with colored glass and gold leaf. It was found at Daphne, or rather a suburb of that ancient place in Yakto, a modern suburb of Antioch.

The discovery was made by the Princeton university expedition. There is in the suburb a huge circus or stadium, three times as large as Palmer stadium at Princeton, that seats 55,000, and lead and terra cotta pipes were found in place, along with a huge bath. All were built, it is surmised, in 67-66 B. C. by Quintus Marcius Rex, proconsul of Celicia.

Antioch goes back to 300 years before Christ, and was named after Antiochus by his son. It was the ancient capital of the Greek kings of Syria, and was located on the Orontes, some twenty miles from the sea. Its port was Selencia. It is frequently mentioned in the New Testament, and it was there that disciples of our Savior were first called Christians. Syria was first conquered by Pompey and later captured by the Persians and made a heap of ruins. It was restored by the Emperor Justinian in 538. In the Seventh century the Saracens took it and held it for 300 years. Now it is a poor town, manufacturing silks, leather and carpets, and producing goat's wool and beeswax.

Threatened Strike in Automobile Industry Settled by the President; "Brain Trust" Faces Inquiry; President Demands Stock Control Measure With "Teeth."

AFTER weeks of exhausting negotiations the threatened strike in the automobile industry was averted when President Roosevelt secured an agreement between executives and labor leaders. Representation for all employees in dealing with management was established, and safeguards were extended to all unions against intimidation or interference.

President Roosevelt

"It is my hope," said the President, "that this system may develop into a kind of works council in industry in which all groups of employees, whatever may be their choice or organization of form of representation, may participate in joint conference with their employers."

He hailed this as basis for a more comprehensive, adequate and equitable system of relations than ever has existed in a large industry.

The agreement avoids the licensing of the automobile industry, which labor threatened to invoke if there was no agreement. The American Federation of Labor is not recognized as such by industry except when its affiliates have the necessary votes on the collective bargaining committee.

One of the provisions of the agreement was that the NRA should set up a board, responsible to the President, to sit in Detroit and pass upon all questions of representation, discharge, and discrimination. Decision of the board is to be final upon all concerned. Three men will serve on the board, one representing labor, one industry, the third being neutral.

Perhaps the greatest concession made by labor was its agreement to submit the lists of its members to the board of three, on which industry is represented. This surrender, however, is safeguarded by the fact that the list is for the board only, to enable it to check against other lists, and that no public disclosure is to be made of it except by direction of the President himself in particular cases.

The agreement is generally regarded as a compromise. All participants joined in saying that it does not represent a victory for either side.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT Monday called on congress to pass legislation with "teeth in it" for the control of the nation's stock and commodity exchanges.

He asked that the law be so severe "that speculation, even as it exists today, will of necessity be drastically curtailed." His demand was made in a letter to Senator Duncan U. Fletcher (Dem., Fla.) and Representative Sam Rayburn (Dem., Texas), chairmen of the congressional committees which are handling the pending stock exchange bills.

Charging the exchanges with organizing one of the most determined lobbies which has fought any of his legislation, the President said that the country would not be satisfied unless the exchange control message is drastic. People generally, the President said, blame the speculation on exchanges for the 1929 artificial boom and the resulting slump.

The President threw his full weight behind the controversial margin restriction sections of the bill. Outlining the type of law he wants, he said.

"The two principal objectives are, as I see it, first, the requirement of what is known as margin so high that speculation, even as it exists today, will of necessity be drastically curtailed, and, second, that the government be given such definite powers of supervision over exchanges that the government itself will be able to correct abuses which may arise in the future."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT Tuesday vetoed the independent offices appropriation bill, carrying the disputed veterans' benefit amendment. The bill passed the senate Monday after a long journey through both houses. It carried the major portion of the administration's economy program.

Although the senate finally agreed to the so-called house "compromise" amendments dealing with veterans' benefits and government pay cut restoration, the President rejected the measure on the ground that the addition of some $200,000,000 to the budget cannot be permitted at this time.

The compromise on the federal pay cut restoration was accepted by the senate by a vote of 59 to 19; the veterans' amendment was agreed to by a vote of 48 to 39.

AUSTRIA'S new corporative constitution, as published in the official government gazette, gives the President powers similar to those possessed by the late Emperor Franz Josef when he ascended the throne after crushing a republican revolution in 1848. The president will rule through the constitution, but may change it whenever he thinks an emergency demands. The constitution will be based on the principle that all power emanates from God—in contrast to the present one, which says all power emanates from the people.

But the people, nevertheless, will be given an opportunity to express their opinion at the polls whenever the government thinks this advisable. Popular initiative, however, is barred and the people will not have constitutional rights to elect their own government. All legislation must be initiated by the government, which will be advised but not controlled by four consultative bodies.

These will be the state council of 40 to 50 members appointed by the president; the federal cultural council, consisting of representatives of churches, religious societies and schools; the federal economic council, chosen from business, industrial, agricultural and financial circles, and the provincial council, consisting of governors and finance ministers of the various provinces.

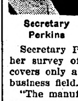
A PLAN for the complete freedom of the Philippines in 1945 or soon thereafter was written upon the statute books when President Roosevelt signed the McDuffie-Tidings bill. The Philippine legislature must accept the measure by October 1. Representatives from the islands present in Washington declared that it would be accepted by the legislature on May 1

"This is a great day for you and for me," the President told President Manuel L. Quezon of the Philippine senate, adding that if invited he would attend the inaugural ceremonies of the new republic ten to twelve years hence.

Senator Tydings, cosponsor of the measure, said May 1 had been designated as acceptance date for the bill to honor the memory of Admiral Dewey, who steamed in, destroyed the Spanish armada and took Manila bay on that date in 1898.

Enactment of the measure came almost exactly thirty-three years after American troops captured Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo to end the Filipino insurrection on March 23, 1901. General Aguinaldo now lives in comparative pensioned retirement, but still is an important figure in island politics.

SECRETARY OF LABOR FRANCES PERKINS announces a jump of 345,000 in industrial employment and a gain of $12,000,000 in weekly pay rolls between January 15 and February 15.



Secretary Perkins

"Factory employment increased 6.1 per cent while pay rolls rose 12.6 per cent," Secretary Perkins said in summing up the developments. She added that since March of last year 2,400,000 workers have returned to industrial jobs and $67,000,000 added to the weekly pay rolls.

Secretary Perkins pointed out that her survey of industrial employment covers only a small part of the total business field.

"The manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries covered," she explained, "normally employ only 20,000,000 of the 49,000,000 gainful workers of the country and therefore these totals do not indicate all changes in employment. To them should be added 10,000 workers reported by the interstate commerce commission to have been taken on during the last month by Class 1 steam railroads, and gains in agricultural employment which normally take place at this time with the beginning of farming activities in the Southern states.

THE advisers comprising the administration's so-called "brain trust" face an investigation. Charges that the President's policies are being ignored by advisers who are plotting to make him only the "Kerensky" of the "American revolution," to be put aside for an eventual "Stalin," aroused immediate reaction in several quarters.

Representative Bulwinkle of North Carolina introduced a resolution in the house calling for an inquiry into the purpose of the group, whose members, according to Dr. William Wirt, superintendent of schools of Gary, Ind., told him they aimed at the overthrow of the existing social order. The resolution asks that Doctor Wirt be called before the interstate commerce committee of the house to divulge which members of the "brain trust" told him, as he alleged, of a plan to hoodwink the President and ultimately establish a Communistic form of government.

THE man who works for a living will get a break if amendments to the income tax law proposed by the senate finance committee are finally adopted. These amendments would take more taxes from big estates and reduce the tax on smaller incomes.

Chairman Harrison estimated that the net result of the changes proposed would add $50,000,000 of annual revenue to the bill.

The committee voted unanimously for a proposal to continue the one-tenth of 1 per cent corporation capital stock and 5 per cent excess profits tax levy, which were repealed when repeal put liquor taxes into effect.

Nature Shows Man the Way

The Most Useful and Ingenious Tools Now in Use Are All Copies; We Got the Idea for Them From Various Birds and Animals.

When you look into a box of carpenter's tools and note the extraordinary variety of instruments contained therein, do you wonder how they all came to be thought of and designed?

Necessity, as we know, is the mother of invention; but, myself, I think it more than likely that man, in making tools to serve his needs, took a leaf—and a very big leaf—out of Mother Nature's book. Man likes to pride himself on his constructive ability, but the question is—did he really invent?

Let's have a look at the world of Nature and see how many of his ideas were "original."

Picture to yourself a caveman—a big, strapping, brawny, but not very brainy specimen—looking at the ground and wondering how he can best make a hole big enough to hide the carcass of a goat which he has just pinched from a neighbor's abode.

What he wants, of course, is a spade, but since no one had yet been clever enough to invent a spade, he has to do a bit of thinking. Next minute he sees a mole digging its way through the earth, and there, in the mole's paws, is the very model which he must copy!

There is his idea for a spade. All he needs now is a little constructive ability to run up a useful tool for digging.

We can safely presume that man fashioned most of his other implements by studying, in a similar fashion, the beasts of the field.

Few trades are older than the carpenter's, yet there were perfect chisels in existence long before these tools found a place on the carpenter's bench.

Four of the best chisels imaginable were—and are—to be seen in the jaws of the humble bunny or any rodent. And—mark this—they are much more serviceable chisels than any of our man-made imitations, because they won't wear out. The more use they get the sharper they become.

If only our chisels did the same!

The world's earliest men must have got quite a lot of ideas as a result of studying the beaks of birds. The long, slender, delicate bills of the snipe and woodcock are perfect examples of natural forceps, enabling their owners to pick up tiny objects from the soft mud in which they feed.

Compare these beaks with the "modern" surgical forceps used in our big hospitals today and—well, cleanliness apart, there is not so very much difference.

The broad bills of the ducks make excellent spoons, while the crow can boast of fine "pickaxes," constructed so as to stand any amount of wear and tear.

Then the fish-eating birds, who have given man a large number of useful "tips." The heron's long beak would naturally suggest the spear, while the crooked beak of the merganser, a diving bird, provides a perfect model of a "hook."

Again, suppose you wanted to make a paddle for a canoe you had built, what better source of inspiration could you wish than the webbed feet of the gulls and ducks?

Or suppose you wanted to make a pair of snowshoes, so that you would be able to walk across snow without sinking into it; you could, surely, get a pretty good idea of what is wanted from watching how the webbed feet of some of the wading birds enable them to walk over soft mud with perfect ease!

The valiant gentlemen of the Middle ages who invented and perfected the suit of mail, no less than the modern designers of the war-time "tank," doubtless prided themselves on their cleverness.

But what about the crab and the lobster, or—if you want a land animal as an illustration—what about the armadillo, that strange-looking South American mammal whose fat, squat body is entirely encased in a horn-like covering—a "suit of mail" that defies almost anything but the business end of a pickax.

One might find hundreds of such "models" in Nature, without having to go very far into the wild; but in most cases man does not make an exact copy of the natural thing, but adapts it to his own individual requirements.

There are exceptions, however. I want to show you a couple of "models" which man has copied almost exactly, without any modification to speak of.

Shoemakers use a pair of special pincers which are almost identical in shape and design with the claws of the lobster, while on many a carpenter's bench today you will see a pair which, though larger, are shaped exactly like the "pincers" affixed to the rear end of the common earwig.

Truly there is nothing new under the sun!—Craven Hill, famous English scientist, in London Answers.

SOVIET WOMEN IN REVOLT AGAINST UGLY CLOTHING

A foreign fashion magazine was a prize in Russia during the five years of sacrifice between 1928 and 1933, and still is. Women like to dress well, and men like women to dress well, and Soviet women who neglected this biological truism have discovered the fact to their hurt. Even during the worst years of the shortage of goods, patent leather shoes and silk stockings appeared in far-off villages, Louis Fischer wrote in a Moscow letter to the London New Statesman and Nation. A good Russian dressmaker can set any price on her services and she will get it. An article in Pravda praised a concert singer who appeared at a workers' club in a silk dress and elegant shoes. Clothing factories have been organizing popular fashion shows, and only the dresses, underwear, suits, etc., selected by the public as best, may be manufactured by the factories and shops. The government has ordered the textile industry to turn out thinner satins and finer silks. Even cotton goods must be of a better grade. "Peasant women refuse to wear coarse prints," said a Moscow daily. The official Izvestia objected to "ugly, untalented designs which do not satisfy the esthetic tastes of the customer." The women of a North Caucasus kolhoz (collective farm) wrote an open letter to Stalin in which they demanded goods that "would make the soul rejoice."—Literary Digest.

"Boys," said a man sitting in a corner, "I can vouch for the truth of that story. A few minutes after that happened I was coming down the side of the hill. I met this lion and, as is my habit, stopped to stroke its whiskers. Boys, those whiskers were wet!"—London Tit-Bits.

Thousands have Ended their Bowel Worries by taking this advice!
Can constipation safely be relieved? "Yes!" say medical men. "Yes!" say the many thousands who have followed their advice and know.
You are not likely to cure your constipation with salts, pills, tablets or any of the habit-forming cathartics. But you can safely relieve this condition by gentle regulation with a suitable liquid laxative.
THE LIQUID TEST:
First: select a properly prepared liquid laxative. Second: take the dose you find suited to your system. Third: gradually reduce the dose until bowels are moving of their own accord.
Simple, isn't it? And it works! The right liquid laxative brings thorough bowel action without using force. An approved liquid laxative (one which is most widely used for both adults and children) is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It is a doctor's prescription, and perfectly safe. Its laxative action is based on senna, a natural laxative; the dose can be measured, and the action thus regulated to suit your individual need.
If there are children in your household, don't give them any fad form of laxative, but use a healthful, helpful preparation like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Its very taste will tell you it is wholesome, and agreeable to the stomach. Delightful taste, and delightful action; there is no discomfort at the time, or after. Ask your druggist for Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, all ready to take.
A Frank Statement Concerning Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin
We believe the use of pills and tablets containing mineral drugs is rapidly giving way to gentle regulation of the bowels with a liquid laxative.
We believe Dr. Caldwell's original prescription of fresh herbs, pure pepsin, and senna is the ideal family laxative.
And we know it is a safe preparation for children and expectant mothers because it does not cause bowel strain or irritate the kidneys.

BLACKLEGOL Dual Potency, Plus!
BLACKLEG ANTIGEN (CUTTER)
Cultural Aggressin 50% efficient
Concentrated Bacteria 50% efficient
BLACKLEGOL 100% efficient
A new and better Blackleg immunizing agent. Guaranteed to produce a greater and more lasting immunity than any other product on the market!
BLACKLEGOL is the result of years of intensive research in the field of blackleg prevention by the combined staffs of the Cutter research and veterinary medical departments, backed by thirty-seven years' experience in the field of preventive medicine.
SCIENTIFIC authorities were agreed that if a great deal more were known about the blackleg organism, and the disease which it causes, a better immunizing agent could be developed. One which would truly produce positive lifetime immunity with one dose, regardless of the age of the calf vaccinated.
It was one thing, however, to know that such a product could be produced, and another to devote the thousands of hours and dollars needed in pure research to find how it could be done!
Hundreds of methods were devised. Lot after lot of different vaccines were experimentally produced and tried both in laboratory and field tests. Some were failures, others fairly good . . . a few were better than any existing product, but the work kept on. Each new experiment gave greater credence to our belief that a far more efficient vaccine could be produced . . . as far superior to such products as aggressin and bacterin as they were to the old string and pill vaccines.
The final result was BLACKLEGOL . . . the first 100% effective Blackleg Vaccine ever produced!
Blacklegol FULL 5 C.C. DOSE 10c PER DOSE
THE SUPERIORITY of BLACKLEGOL can best be illustrated by comparing it with two well-known present day products: Concentrated Bacterin, and Cultural Aggressin (Filtrate).
Cultural Aggressin is made by growing blackleg organisms in a broth-like medium (bacteria food) and then filtering the organisms out, leaving the filtrate, which after further processing is called Cultural Aggressin (or Filtrate) and used as a vaccine
Concentrated Bacterin is made by much the same process . . . up to a certain point! Blackleg organisms are grown in a broth-like medium. Then the organisms are separated from the Cultural Aggressin; but in this case it is the Cultural Aggressin which is poured down the sink, while the organisms and the small amount of fluid remaining are further processed, called Concentrated Bacterin, and used as a vaccine.
To repeat: The Cultural Aggressin is thrown away to make Concentrated Bacterin, and the Concentrated Bacterin is thrown away to make Cultural Aggressin! (Note illustrations on the left-hand page.)
It seems silly doesn't it? But it isn't, or at least it wasn't until the introduction of BLACKLEGOL! The difficulty lay in the fact that scientists knew how to culture blackleg organisms so that either the organisms or the filtrate would be fairly high in immunizing value; but never both at the same time.
The answer to that problem took years to work out. Hundreds of experiments were made, in which thousands of laboratory animals were used. A small fortune was expended, but the answer was worth it as it brought forth BLACKLEGOL, the first 100% efficient blackleg vaccine ever produced.
This is just part of the story of BLACKLEGOL! Write for further information telling how a vaccine produced by this method has already been tested on thousands of calves and has proven an unfailing blackleg preventive. How the work went on until a chemical was discovered which increased the immunizing value of even this vaccine to an almost unbelievable value . . . the plus value of BLACKLEGOL, which is already twice as potent as other products!

Erskine, Minn.— State Senator Richard T. Buckler, Crookston farmer, is the endorsed candidate for the Farmer-Labor Party nomination for Ninth District Congressman. He was selected after a spirited battle with six other candidates at the largest Farmer-Labor convention ever staged in the district, more than 500 delegates and 200 visitors being present in the local high school auditorium.

The veteran Polk County legislature was unanimously endorsed when the final ballot showed him leading A. C. Townley of Ottertail county by a comparatively close margin.

Other candidates presented for nomination and who promised the convention nominee their their united support were: Verner Nelson of Roseau, Elmer Holm of Dilworth, Sen. Harry Bridgeman of Bemidji, Leonard Houske of Halstad, and H. O. Berve of Thief River Falls. One of the Tomnley leaders made the motion for the unanimous endorsement of Senator Buckler.

Senator Buckler has represented Polk County in the state senate three terms where he has fouht through much legislation in behalf of the farmer and agriculture. In 1931 he was the author of the state prison twine and farm machinery price reduction bill; in 1923 legislation reducing the contract rate of interest from 10 to 8 percent; and numerous bills which reduced the penalty and interest on delinquent real estate taxes.

The Farmer-Labor endorsed candidate has been a "dirt farmer" all the 25 years he has lived in Polk County. He was chairman of the Farmer-Labor party in 1924 and one of the early pioneers in the movement.

To Sell No Trust Fund Lands

On April 12, 1934, the Land Use Committee created by Chapter 436, Laws 1933 at its session in the office of the Conservation Commission in the State Office Building, St. Paul, adopted the following resolution, which resolution and cecommendation was approved by the Conservation Commission then in session:

Whereas, the question of the desirability of selling state-owned trust fund lands located within legally created conservation areas has been brought to the attention of the Land Use Committee, and

Whereas, the importance of designating the uses to which lands within said conservation areas are to be used for the future is recognized, and

Whereas, the Land Classification Committee in the various counties have not as yet classified the lands as provided by laws 1933, Chapter 436, and have not yet made their recommendations to the Land Use Committee;

Now, Therefore, Be It Resolved by the Land Use Committee that it recommends to the Conservation Commission that no state-owned trust fund lands located within legally created conservation zones be sold during the current year but that lands which are suitable for agricultural use be leased to such settlers as may indicate a desire to use them for these purposes.

The effect of this will be that no state trust fund lands will be sold in the newly created conservation areas in Roseau, Marshall, Mahnomen and Aitkin Counties, though leases for farming or hay stumpage may be issued.

A crowd of about three hundren people were present at the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Reiersod of Thief River Falls, which was held on Tuesday afternoon, April 17 at 4:30 in the Evangelical Free church in that city.

Several parties have been picked up here the past week by the State Highway Patrol for driving without proper car license, no driver's license, overloads, and for feeling a little too good. It is best to be careful as we understand the fine for entering the highway without stopping where there is a sign, is the small sum of $10.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

The thing that surprises me most about the modern driving is this: All the manufacturers are busy designing automobiles as mechanically safe as possible. Late developments have brought in safety glass, four wheel brakes, and other numerous safety features. But automobile dealers sell them to every human being that can afford to buy one.

No effort is being made apparently to make the individual as safe as possible. No examinations are made as to his mental condition. No examination is is made as to his eyes and hearing. Should not these factors be just as important in the driving of an automobile as the automobile itself?

Expert driving is a term that is often abused. Some drivers believe they are experts when they can cut their way across lines of traffic, run against the warning conveyed by signs or traffic lights and turn corners on two wheels.

The individuals should be tested also before they are allowed to drive.

First Forest Fire This Year

Minnesota's first 1934 forest fire occured in the northern part of the United States, the northwest angle country. Four men were used to control the fire which did only slight damage due to the wet condition of the forest cover.

"Usually the first forest fires occur further south near Moose Lake or Brainerd," Grover Conzet, director of the Division of Forestry and Fire Prevention, said.

C. W. Swan and family who moved to Thief River Falls last fall have now moved to Greenbush. Mr. Swan is employed as a car salesman there for the Northern Chevrolet company at Thief River who opened a branch up there this spring.

License Campaign Started

A state-wide campaign for the enforcement of the drivers license law is now under way, according to a bulletin from the state highway department. All peace officers have been asked to cooperative in enforcing the measure.

More than 800,000 licenses have been issued, but it is estimated that there are still many thousands of drivers who have neglected to apply for their driver permits.

About 3,000 licenses are being held by the drivers license bureau of the highway department in St. Paul because applications were improperly made out, and those persons who made applications but have not received their licenses should communicate immediately with the bureau.

Every driver must have an individual license, and must carry it with him at all times. Those who drive without a license are subject to fine or a jail sentence.

What Are The Railroads For?

We all like fast transportation but when it comes right down to common sense there is none of us that enjoy going out on the highway and drive on a soft shoulder or partly in the ditch to avoid the large trucks and vans that have taken possession of the roads. There is not much gain in the high priced licenses these fellows pay to the State when you stop and figure out the actual damage that they are doing to the highways.

Take for example the thirteen mile stretch from here to Thief River Falls. The road bed below Steiner is not much more than a streak with a lot of bad holes and deep ruts. Who is to blame for this?

Let the railroads carry the loads that weigh several tons instead of piling them on a truck with a narrow tire and cut the highway to pieces like a lot of them do. What will happen when the railroads quit and the highways are shot?

A Little Bit Humorous

ONE FOR S. P. C. A.

"My husband is a brute, and I've reached the place where I just can't stand him any longer?" said Mrs. Nosey.

"Now what's he done?" asked her dearest friend.

"Well, you know we were on a 4-party line, and he's gone and had it replaced with a private one, so I can't listen in any more," she groaned.

Not the Same Thing

"Darling," she murmured, and her voice was shaky, "how do I know that you really and truly love me?"

"My pet, I can prove it," he said. "Why, I can't sleep at nights for thinking of you."

"H'm," she muttered doubtfully, "that's no proof. Pa can't sleep at nights for thinking of you, but I hardly think it's love."

Right Size

McPherson was to be married.

"Ye'll be given' us a send-off?" he inquired of his best man.

"We will."

"With rice and white ribbons?"

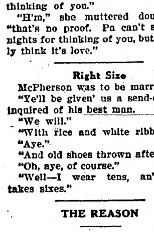
"Aye."

"And old shoes thrown after us?"

"Oh, aye, of course."

"Well—I wear tens, an' Janet takes sixes."

THE REASON



For a breath our gas bills never pause,
Those sprinters fast and fleet,

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spreed. Learning of Polaris' dire straits, and hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters. He finds Franz, a scoundrel, plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew, by lucky chance, assumes that he is Flynn's son, and he does not disillusion them, taking charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate Flynn, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. MacDonald, eccentric old Scotsman, holds timber vital to the Polaris interests. Steve gains the warm friendship of LaFane, queer woods scout. He adds to Franz's hate by driving him away from Mary Wolf, young Indian girl whom he has been abusing.

This all required time and it took more time to set the gun with proper firmness, stock held fast by those well-arranged rocks. Next, he stripped branches from a young birch, carried the cord back from the gun around that, on down and parallel to the trail for a dozen feet, around another tree and finally across the trail itself. He took in the slack with precise caution and made the end fast to a stump.

He had worked in darkness; he had moved slowly, he had listened, always listened. And the time which elapsed gave two men, walking the beach so quietly that they disturbed no pebble, an opportunity to travel from headquarters to the foot of the trail where the canoe lay in the reeds before he was finished.

LaFane had glided into the light that fell through the store doorway, a tall, statuesque figure. He stood a moment, at some little distance, before he spoke.

"Jim," he said in his deep voice, "will you come here?"

Impressed Steve had risen, left Tom Todd and followed as LaFane turned back into the shadows. They walked to the water's edge and halted.

"Don't go to your camp tonight," LaFane said.

"No? Why not? What's up?"

The man shrugged. "Don't know. But a man does not paddle his canoe so quietly that even a dog is not sure he hears, twenty rods away. A man does not walk up the trail to another man's camp with a gun in his hands for any good purpose."

"What are you getting at? Somebody gone to my shanty?"

LaFane nodded.

"Who?"

"That would only be a guess. I could almost touch him as he passed but I could only guess."

"Well, seems to me that's the time a man should go."

"That is for you to decide."

"Come along, then, or"—hesitating—"I don't want to drag you into any jam."

LaFane laughed softly. "Hurry," he said, "or you may only guess, too."

The sand deadened their footfalls and they went with utmost care. At the cabin trail they halted, Steve laying a hand on LaFane's arm.

Just the breath of a sound, the merest suggestion of approach, reached them and they sank together in the high reeds. Some one was coming, surely, approaching with stealth.

He loomed above them so closely that they could hear his breathing, so near that both could have touched him. He stooped for his canoe with a light whiff of breath, as in relief.

"Looking for somebody?"

Steve's words, so sharp, so unexpected, caused the man to gasp. But he did not turn, did not hesitate. He pitched forward in a lunge for his canoe.

Drake flung out a hand to grapple with the figure before him but he was too late. The canoe rasped bottom, water splashed. Steve floundered, LaFane behind him. His fingers tore at the figure there, clutching the heavy shirt. The move caused an inarticulate syllable to burst from the man's lips, all but dragged him from his balance, but he tore free.

Drake, his hold gone, was falling prone in inches of water while La Fane stumbled over him.

But a foot had found purchase, a leg had straightened; under that drive the canoe shot outward and although LaFane hurled himself forward and swam stoutly he could not overtake it and as he gave up the sound of swift paddle strokes reached them mockingly.

They stood still, listening to those sounds grow fainter. Then Steve, reaching into his pocket for a flashlight, turned its beam on his left hand. In his palm was a button, torn threads clinging to it; a plain, brown button. . . .

"D—n!" he said. "Come on, LaFane, let's have a look at the trail."

The light of the torch showed them the cord and, edging around it, they reached the gun. It was a twelve-gauge shotgun, safety off, set for the first unsuspecting traveler on that trail.

Steve cut the cord, set the safety and ejected the shells. He gave no sign of excitement but when he spoke his voice was somewhat husked.

"Buckshot," he said. "It'd have blown my guts out. Much obliged, LaFane. . . . And can I get you to keep this to yourself? No use talking until we have somebody to talk to."

"That's right," the man said. "Good night."

He went quickly down the trail.

Three days later Steve paddled up the lake bound for the wood camp. He was frowning, filled with misgiving.

That noon LaFane had brought a letter from Kate, written after receiving word that the railroad construction was blocked. Her despair had touched him profoundly, goaded him to fresh effort. And yet, what to do? No new capital was forthcoming, no extension of time could be anticipated from impatient creditors. He was keeping the job alive for a few weeks and that was all, so far.

Another canoe rounded a long point and came toward him and as the distance narrowed Steve's lip quirked. It was Franz, whom he had not seen or heard of since their encounter on the upper river.

He pointed his canoe to Drake's.

"Howdy," he said in an odd tone, trailing his paddle. "How's Young Jim Flynn today?"

A peculiar inference was in the words and he grinned with something like insolence.

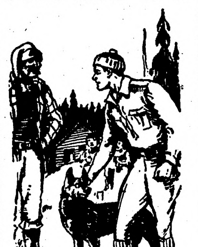
Steve's eyes dropped to the man's clothing and his outfit. The bottom of his canoe was smeared with red clay.

"Don't you figure you've crawled about far enough out on this particular limb?" Franz asked.

A sharp thrill of apprehension ran Drake's body.

"Meaning just what?" he countered.

"Principally, that the original Young Jim Flynn is on his way in; or will be when he sobers up." The man laughed. "Won't it be interesting to watch McNally and the rest of these dubs? And to see the real boss, well pickled, a shaking, miserable spectacle, come to take charge of a sinking ship?



"Great Hat!" Declared Drake. "How'd You Do It, LaFane?"

"And won't it also be interesting for you to explain to somebody how you came to be spending Polaris money so free and easy? Why, you d—d pretender, he'll have licked up what booze he's got in a few hours; he's out of money; he'll come to try to do what he was supposed to try to do a month ago! And when he finds you here, playing his part, even he'll run you off so fast it'll make your head swim!"

Steve's head did swim then, for an instant.

It was not thought of what Young Jim Flynn might do that caused confusion. The factor in the situation which loomed high in his consciousness was the effect on a blinded girl, hundreds of miles away, that the arrival of the one with true authority might have. His feeling of obligation to the family had oddly shifted from father to daughter.

Steve had kept the job alive by his ability to give men confidence in his leadership. This was no feeling of self-satisfaction, of conceit; it was simply the fact.

But Young Jim's advent would send the fragile structure of Polaris hopes crumbling. The important matter before Drake now was to seal Franz's lips, to prevent spread of the news the man bore because, should the rumor that he was only a pretender spread and should he be questioned, he would be forced to admit the truth. That would be enough to put everything in a sorry tangle.

He studied the other closely, noting the deep pockets in the breast of his shirt. He raised a hand to fumble in one of his own pockets, fingers closing on that which reposed there.

"Franz, you're untidy," he said.

The man looked hard at him and laughed.

"What're you driving at, now?" he asked. "A lot of interest you've got in how I look."

"Not a great deal, that's true. But a man who's careless about where he leaves buttons from his clothing is likely to stir up interest in other folks' minds."

The other sneered.

"Buttons!"

"Yes. Like this one." Steve opened his hand, displaying a smooth, brown button. "You see, this one happens to belong under the flap of your right-hand shirt pocket. No button there; this one's mate in on the other pocket.

"And even if it weren't for this button," Drake went on, "I have plenty on you. I took a lot of pains in handling that shotgun."

"Shotgun? I don't know what you're talking about!"

"You'd naturally say that. But it's a good gun. It had been well cared for. There's plenty of gun oil on it to keep the rust off and to take the print of a man's fingers!"

"I don't know what you're talking about, I tell you!"

"Then you're a lot dumber than I'd figured on! You see, Franz, it's one of these air-tight cases. You've a double motive to raise the devil with me. Twenty men saw me knock you for a row of something on my first night here at headquarters. It spilled a lot of beans you'd taken a lot of pains to gather. Old man Wolf and Mary would be believed in court if they told what happened up above the other day. When one man interferes between another man and his girl that also establishes motive, doesn't it?

"So much for reasons. Added to that, I've a witness who heard a man land at the foot of my trail the other night and warned me to be cagey and was with me when this skulker was interrupted slightly in his get-away. I made a grab for him. The witness saw it. All I got was a button, but it's this particular button. No good in court, likely but it convinces me, you see.

"Right after we tried to get more than a buttonhold on this bird, this witness and I found a gun set in my trail, loaded and ready to blow me to kingdom come. That gun is covered with finger-prints."

The other's face paled.

"Talk!" he snarled. "Bunk! If you think you can tie me up to something I don't know about you've got a flock of guesses coming!" But the paddle, held lightly in one of his hands, rattled against the gunwale.

On that Steve grinned easily.

"I'll make you this promise, Franz: one word from you about the game I'm playing—which I admit to you freely, now—or about another man said to be Young Jim Flynn in this country, and I'll have the sheriff on you and an attempted murder charge against you.

"Don't think I'm stalling because I don't go through with this thing now. A whole lot depends on keeping what you and I know to ourselves.

"I'm not promising to let this set-gun case drop. Nothing like that. But I'll make no move in it so long as I'm convinced it's advisable to keep on playing the game I've been playing since the start . . . that is, unless you start folks guessing. So if you want to find out just how quick and how hard I'll bear down, just let your tongue run. I don't care where the story comes from; if it so much as starts I'll put the clamps on you. Get that?"

Franz caught his breath to reply.

"Hold it! I don't want to hear another d—d word from you! We seem to understand each other plenty and using up more words now is . . . just using up more words!"

He resumed his way, leaving Franz with a baffled look on his face in which a helpless rage and great relief mingled.

Drake went on to the wood camp, pondering this new complication. Young Jim's coming would mean more than disaster for the operation of the property; just as surely as it would precipitate trouble here, it would eventually mean heartbreak for Kate Flynn and this, oddly, seemed to him to be of greater importance than the effect on such items as production and credit.

As Steve came abreast of LaFane's cabin on his return he saw the man and his children in the dooryard. More, the great dog, Duke, was with them, walking slowly about and on his either side walked a child.

"Evening!" Steve hailed ashore and LaFane saluted gravely.

As Drake stepped ashore he saw the dog's lips draw back, exposing the long, white fangs and then the animal, as if reminded of some important matter that had been temporarily forgotten, looked up into LaFane's face. LaFane was looking toward Steve but the dog's threatened snarl did not materialize, he licked his chops as if in chagrin and the tip of his tail waggled ever so slightly.

"Walk up and touch him," LaFane said, amusement in his face.

"Hullo, Duke," Steve muttered, stepping forward, hand extended.

The dog lowered his head, stopped his leisurely panting and stiffened. But when the hand touched him in light caress he flopped his bushy tail and let his tongue loll again.

"Great hat!" declared Drake. "How'd you do it, LaFane?"

The other chuckled, then, as one will whose pride has been fed.

"There are ways," he said. "Take him down the beach, children."

The three little girls scampered along the sand, the eldest calling to the dog to follow. Duke still sat there but he stared eagerly at his master, ears cocked expectantly.

"Go on!" the man said. "Go on! Take care of 'em, Duke!"

INDICT GRANDMA AS SPOILER OF THE LITTLE ONES

Now the psychologists are hopping on poor old grandma. First it was the parents that were responsible for all the complexes that children developed. They fastened on the little dears complexes with sinister names which, it was alleged, led to much of their unhappiness and mischief and maladjustment to the duties and responsibilities of later life. The only way out seemed to be children without the intervention of parents, but the psychologists offered no constructive suggestions along fundamental lines.

But now Dr. Garry Cleveland Myers, psychologist and child-training expert from Cleveland, insists on children without grandparents. He declared the revered silver haired matron is the worst mischief in bringing up children.

The psychologists have discovered nothing new. Their chief contribution is an overemphasis, which splits the ears of the groundlings and makes the front page. It has long been common folklore and observation that grandparents, stern with their own brood, are overindulgent with their children's children. And before the modern scientific indictment of parents and grandparents, the old Romans made the uncle the goat. In fact, they had the same word for nephew and spoiled child. It's all pretty tough on the kids to have to carry on not only with the weight of heredity but to have to go through environmental association with their parents and grandparents and collateral relatives.

But what to do about it? There are few such exceptions as Pallas Athene.—San Francisco Chronicle.

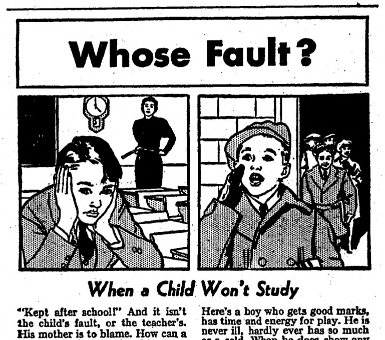
Whose Fault?



When a Child Won't Study

"Kept after school!" And it isn't the child's fault, or the teacher's. His mother is to blame. How can a boy get his lessons when his senses are dulled day after day by dosing with sickening purgatives? When a child's bowels are stagnant they need help, of course. But not some drastic drug to upset the stomach, perhaps weaken the entire system; or form the laxative habit. On the right, parents will find a happy solution of this problem:

Here's a boy who gets good marks, has time and energy for play. He is never ill, hardly ever has so much as a cold. When he does show any symptoms of being sluggish, his mother knows just what to do. She gives him a little California Syrup of Figs—and that is all. It's a natural, fruity laxative that is agreeable to take, and its gentle laxative action comes from senna. Parents are urged to use just pure California Syrup of Figs. Be sure bottle says 'California'.

Idioms Used to Build Up English Language

A savage tribe in Tierra del Fuego has a vocabulary of 30,000 words and are the only savages in the world so richly supplied. We might borrow a few and they'd never be missed. We thus appropriated "hooch" from the Alaska Indians and have much enjoyed using it; that is, using the word. Hooch is a phonetic joy. It has that wild and slightly vulgar sound that seems to fit a crude intoxicant. English-speaking peoples are quick to pick up words odd to the ears from their neighbors, giving them a twist that may make their utterance more or less comic. "Hoosegow," made over from the Spanish "huskado," provokes a laugh. The English in India soon appropriated "loot"; and "bulldoze" arose out of the swamps of Louisiana, where it was for long a neglected verb derived from the French. Other terms that spring into being in the underworld in time get fairly into good society by succeeding gradations and there are now in good standing some from the patois of the pirates of the Spanish Main.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Why Liquid Laxatives are Back in Favor

The public is fast returning to the use of liquid laxatives. People have learned that the right dose of a properly prepared liquid laxative will bring a perfect movement without any discomfort at the time, or after.

The dose of a liquid laxative can be varied to suit the needs of the individual. The action can thus be regulated. A child is easily given the right dose. And mild liquid laxatives do not irritate the kidneys.

Doctors are generally agreed that senna is a natural laxative. It does not drain the system like the cathartics that leave you so thirsty. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a liquid laxative which relies on senna for its laxative action. It gently helps the average person's bowels back to regularity.

You can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store, ready for use. Member N. R. A.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

Revision of the Railway Labor Act Demanded by Eastman; First Quarter of 1934 Shows Business Improvement; Turkey Orders Extradition of Insull.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

IMMEDIATE comprehensive revision of the national railway labor act to expedite and enforce the settlement of disputes between the railroads and their employees and to safeguard the right of collective bargaining, was recommended by Joseph B. Eastman, federal co-ordinator of transportation, in a letter to Representative Sam Rayburn, chairman of the house interstate commerce committee. His outstanding recommendations were these:

J. B. Eastman

The creation of a new national board of adjustment, divided into four independent parts, whose awards would be enforceable in the courts.

The substitution of a new national mediation board of three members for the present board of mediation of five members.

The inclusion of all companies which operate equipment or facilities or furnish service included within the definition of the terms "railroad" and "transportation" in the interstate commerce act.

Provisions similar to those in the temporary emergency railroad transportation act of last year, insuring "the complete divorcement of railroad employees and managements in the choice of representatives to deal one with the other" and providing adequate means for the enforcement of these provisions.

The national adjustment board would be divided into four independent parts to adjust disputes arising from grievances or from the interpretation or application of agreements between the railroads and the employees. Each division would be composed of an equal number of representatives of management and labor. In case of a deadlock, a neutral member would be appointed by the national mediation board.

THE first quarter of 1934 proved the most active in business since 1931, with some lines, notably automobile production, making the best showing since 1930. The easing of the labor tension with the settlement of the automobile controversy was followed by the announcement of principal steel companies, and some other industrial concerns, of 10 per cent increases in wages.

Spreading of the movement to increase the compensation of labor was viewed hopefully by merchandise distribution lines and producers of consumers goods. It has added a new element of uncertainty over costs. Some buying of steel developed in expectation of price increases, although production continued little changed, just under 50 per cent of capacity.

Retail trade has experienced a pre-Easter shopping season widely described as the best in four years. Wholesalers are running into a seasonal lull, but retailers are hopeful of a continuance of expanded volumes of spring merchandise as warm weather arrives. Seasonal lines have been moving in large volume.

SAMUEL INSULL, fugitive utility magnate, has learned that Uncle Sam has long arms. He thought himself safe aboard the chartered freighter, on which he escaped from Greece, anchored at Istambul, but Uncle Sam's long arm tagged him and he was arrested by the Turkish authorities. The council of ministers immediately ordered his extradition to the United States. Two eminent Turkish lawyers on behalf of Insull filed an appeal with the supreme court of Turkey against the extradition order. They ask the court to examine the legality of the indictments, claiming that the council of ministers acted against Turkish law in ordering the extradition.

Unless the former utilities magnate is able to perform some new wonder, his year and a half flight almost halfway around the world has been brought to an end.

Meanwhile, Washington officials are making plans to expedite Insull's return to the United States. Whether he shall be tried on state or federal charges, or on both, is a point that has not yet been decided. The issue depends on the terms under which Turkey surrenders him.

IN THE foreword of his forthcoming new book, "On Our Way," President Roosevelt says if his administration "is a revolution, it is a peaceful one, achieved without violence, without the overthrow of the purpose of established law and without the denial of just treatment to any individual or class."

The proofs of the foreword, given out by the publishers, the John Day company, read:

"Some people have called our new policy 'fascism.' It is not fascism because its inspiration springs from the mass of the people themselves rather than from a class or a group or a marching army. Moreover, it is being achieved without a change in fundamental republican method. We have kept the faith with, and in, our traditional political institutions.

"Some people have caled it 'communism'; it is not that, either. It is not a driving regimentation founded upon the plans of a perpetuating directorate which subordinates the making of laws and the processes of the courts to the orders of the executives. Neither does it manifest itself in the total elimination of any class or in the abolition of private property."

ROME witnessed one of the most magnificent Easters in its long history as the capital of Catholic Christendom. To the usual imposing Easter ceremonies in St. Peter's cathedral were added this year, by special will of Pope Pius, the solemn liturgical rites canonizing Dom Giovanni Bosco, humble Turin priest. Easter also ended the holy year proclaimed by the pontiff in commemoration of the nineteenth century of the crucifixion. Eighty thousand people pressed inside St. Peter's for the canonization ceremonies and the pontifical mass afterwards, and nearly 300,000 more were estimated to have crowded into St. Peter's square. Among the crowds were 100,000 on pilgrimages from many different countries.

WEARY from the strain of close application to the affairs of state, President Roosevelt departed for a short vacation aboard Vincent Astor's yacht. He headed for the warm climes of southern waters to fish and relax for a week. It was an unprecedented move for the Executive to leave Washington while congress is in session, but with the same spirit of a year ago when he set out on the same yacht before taking the Presidential reins, the President greeted his cronies aboard ship and waved his hat to a rousing farewell from the folks on the dock at Jacksonville, Fla., where he boarded the yacht.

With carefree happiness he posed for the photographers and joshed the newspaper men. He chatted eagerly with his eldest son, James, who joined him here for the cruise.

For the next week or more, the President will be fishing and swimming, away from the heavy cares of office.

ACTING under the power delegated to him by President Roosevelt under an executive order, National Recovery Administrator Johnson approved an amendment to the bituminous coal code imposing a five-day week of 35 hours and revising its wage scale upward, figured on a $5 base with differentials, on the entire bituminous coal industry. The amendment is subject to a hearing on April 9. Authoritative sources in Washington agreed that the operators would accept the amendment, at least until after the hearing and that the threat of a strike is avoided at least until after that hearing by the action of the NRA head.

Gen. Johnson

John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, issued a statement praising the action of the administration and promising the co-operation of the union.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE JOHN C. KNOX of New York upheld the minimum rate fixed by the dyers' and cleaners code in what was officially declared to be the federal government's first appearance in court on a clean-cut issue involving the national recovery act.

The decision held that the government was entitled to a judgment restraining the Spotless Dollar Cleaners, Inc., a concern operating some 32 stores in and about the city, from performing services for patrons at less than the code fixed minimum prices.

It was charged in the suit that the defendant company was dry cleaning men's suits for 39 cents each and women's dresses for 45 cents apiece as against the 70 and 75 cent minimum, respectively, fixed under the code.

"In rendering this decision," wrote Judge Knox, "I know full well that it may be a distinct step beyond the boundaries which in peace times have been said to circumscribe the powers of congress. If defendant be immediately restrained from continuing its violation of the minimum prices of the code, and my conclusion should hereafter be held to be erroneous, great damage will be its portion. Therefore I will suspend the operation of the injunction for ten days. Within that period defendant can apply to the Court of Appeals for further delay."

AUSTRIA'S new corporative constitution, as published in the official government gazette, gives the president powers similar to those possessed by the late Emperor Franz Josef when he ascended the throne after crushing a republican revolution in 1848. The president will rule through the constitution, but may change it whenever he thinks an emergency demands. The constitution will be based on the principle that all power emanates from God—in contrast to the present one, which says all power emanates from the people.

Cater to Guests in Dinner Menus

Perfect Hostess Seeks to Learn Preference of Her Friends.

The hostess who wishes to have menus which appeal particularly to the palate of a house guest will often find that this is by no means extravagant. In these days, when expenses have to be curtailed, it is well to remember this, for by so doing it is possible to entertain at small cost, especially those whom one knows well.

One hostess who was having week-end guests was planning a menu which required rather more of an outlay than she had hoped, when she remembered her friend was very fond of mushrooms and she also liked rice. She combined the two to make a delicious main dish.

The mushrooms were well washed and sauted in butter, when removed, and a rich cream sauce made by the addition of more butter, flour, and then rich milk. The mushrooms were added and left for a few moments to get well coated.

The mushrooms were served in the center of a ring of rice garnished with circles of hard-boiled eggs. The whole was encircled with watercress and parsley. By begining the meal with tomato bisque and ending it with chocolate bavarian a delicious menu resulted. Tea was served with the meal, although coffee would be equally appropriate.

Some persons are very fond of spaghetti and macaroni. A delicious main dish combines fowl, chicken or other meat, which can be left-overs, with cooked tomatoes, celery, and sweet pepper slivers. Baked or creamed macaroni with tomato or cheese is another fine dish. These foods are hearty and economical. The seasoning should be given special attention in the meat and macaroni combinations.

Salads can be inexpensive when they make use of small quantities of various left-overs. If the dressing is well made, whether French, mayonnaise, Russian, boiled, etc., the salad has an appeal to most persons. It is a favorite American dish.

Soup is enjoyed by a surprisingly large group of people. Your guest may be of the number. If so, here is an opportunity to cater to her appetite sometimes with hearty soups which decrease the cost of other courses on the menu. Chowders are chief among substantial soups. Oyster and clam stews are close seconds. Cream soups, vegetable soup, pea and bean soups, especially black bean soup, and barley soup have hearty ingredients. After any of the above a light main course and dessert, or salad and dessert can complete the thrifty meal satisfactorily.

The thoughtful hostess offers her house guests something to eat before retiring. It may be fruit, a bowl of soup, a glass of milk with crackers or cookies, etc. Some persons find this late bit of food conducive to sleep, therefore these refreshments are very welcome. Such catering to guests adds comfort to visits.

Directors Held Meeting

The directors of the Holt Telephone Co. had a business meeting here Tuesday evening. Hans Olson of Viking was here and tried to lease the system from them but as far as we are able to find out no deal was made. It is understood, however, that some local party is interested in taking it over according to the plan worked out at the annual meeting held some time ago.

Some people do not have the chance to work or play in the open air or get fresh air in their work rooms. But at night it is different. We spend a third of our time in bed, and while we are asleep we can get plenty of fresh air.

You should always have all the windows in your bed room open. The night air will not hurt you. It is good for you. If you breathe good air all night, you will feel more rested in the morning and better able to do your work.

Springtime Brings Headaches To The Highway Engineers

To some persons, spring means blissful love, tra la, tra la to others it means tender, rhaphsodic poetry, (or near-poetry. It spells new hats for the ladies, if they're lucky, planting time for the farmer. To the maintenance engineers of the state highway department, however, spring means that season when a certain type of truck driver insists that he can haul ten tons over a highway which has been restricted to a three-ton limit.

Furthermore, this same type of truck or bus man, says a highway department bulletin, is firmly convinced that if his particular load isn't permitted to go through without interference, a goodly share of the state's population will starve or otherwise perish within twelve hours.

"At this season numerous stretches of road are restricted as to the load limits which they can carry," says the bulletin. "The Highway department places these restrictions in force because heavier loads will pound the soft roads to pieces and cost the taxpayers thousands of dollars in unnecessary expense. A good gravel road or light bituminous surface can be ruined for a whole season by too heavy loads during the spring breakup.

"The department is besieged with pleas to make special exceptions for loads of groceries, loads of cattle feed, school buses timber loads and almost every other commodity. The department cannot make exceptions. Either the roads must be restricted to all, or they must be left open to all. and in the latter case this would mean that they would shortly become impassable to even light traffic. Two or three small trucks can be used instead of one over-weight truck to get loads through, and passenger cars can replace school buses temporarily when necessary to preserve the roads at this season.

"Many drivers are anxious to co-operate in this, and they are serving the best interests of the public and themselves."

List Of High Cream Producers For 1933 At The Creamery

We are this week publishing the list of patrons that produced about 1500 pounds of butterfat or more for the year of 1933. There are not quite as many as in former years which, is due mostly to weather conditions.

We find that Arno Steinhauer heads the list again this year with C. F. Lindholm a close second. This is the ninth successive year that Arno has held high honors in the local creamery which is a remarkable record and is something to be proud of.

From what we have learned from Mr. Steinhuer, he is not likely to hold this place for 1934 due to hard luck with his herd. He was forced to dispose of a number of his cows. With Carl Lindholm so close to first place I believe he will give the rest of the patrons a run for first place this year.

Steinhauer has always been a one-hundred per cent cooperator and is to be complimented on his loyal support to the local creamery from which he admits he has benefited a great deal by so doing.

Here is the list.

News From The A.A.A. About How To Seed

Land seeded in 1934 to wheat mixed with other grains will be classified under the wheat reduction contract, according to the proportion of wheat contained in the seed mixture. This ruling has been announced recently by the wheat section of the Agriculture Adjustment Administration.

If the total mixture so seeded contains 50 percent or more wheat, by weight, the total area so seeded will be classified as wheat acreage; if 25 percent or less of wheat, as non-wheat land and if more than 25 per cent but less than 50 percent wheat, "that portion of the total acreage which the weight of the wheat seeded bears to the total weight of all the grain seeded" will be donsidered wheat acreage.

For instance, if the farmer should seed 60 acres to a mixture containing one-third wheat, by weight, 20 acres would be considered as sown to wheat. Signers of the wheat contract must obtain special permission from their county allotment committee to seed mixtures of wheat with barley, oats or flax. They must specify in their request the acreage to be seeded and the proporations, by weight, of the various grains in the mixture. The growing crop will be inspected to verify the producer's statement.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and son Milton and Mr. and Mrs. Harry Engen and children drove to Bemidji on Sunday afternoon by the way of the Red Lakes. The road from Holt to the outlet at the Lakes is in fine condition.

Land To Be Classified

Temporary withdrawel of state lands from public sale in conservation areas in Marshall and Roseau counties to permit proper classification has just been announced by the state Land Use Committee. In Roseau county, 16,000 acres of land and in Marshall county 8,000 acres are effected by this order.

Leasing or renting of this land will be permitted for hay stumpage grazing or other agricultural purposes, F. A. Wildes, Director of the Division of Lands and Minerals, announced.

Salesman Had Big Turnover

Ted Osied of Roosevelt, a driver for a tobacco company, took a bad spill here late last Thursday afternoon with a new Chev panel truck he was driving. He was coming into town from north when he set the brakes a little too hard and they locked on one front wheel and the truck went over forward twice in a summersault. The driver was unhurt but the truck looked rather lop-sided after the turnover.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Darke has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout, and adds to Franz's hate by driving him away from Mary Wolf, Indian girl whom he has been abusing. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act.

—8—

With a great bound he was gone, flying after the children as fast as he had rushed on another day. But this time he did not pursue to maim or kill. When he overtook the children he ran among them, bunting them aside, licking ecstatically at hands and faces, frolicking like a spaniel puppy!

LaFane gave his deep chuckle again.

"But how in the name of Heaven?" Drake insisted.

"I had it to do. And when a man has a thing to do it must be done. Isn't that so? When you first saw him, I had had him here only three days. I had been watching him, trying to find out what he was like. I knew him pretty well but I made one mistake: I was careless about the strength of the chain that held him. I should have made sure of that, knowing him as well as I did, and with the children here."

He was still a moment.

"He was as dangerous as I'd guessed. If it had not been for you, we would be bearing a great sorrow now. I took him that afternoon into the bush. Just the two of us. He came back . . . mine."

"You knocked the poison all out of him?"

LaFane shook his head. "No. I did not strike him often. When I did, of course, it counted. That was one thing. After that was over, I put him in harness. I made him drag things through the brush. I let him get hung up and then forced him to try his best to pull loose. His best, understand; made him pull his heart out. And then, when he'd used all his strength and could not get free, I helped him. When he found out that he had a job to do and could not do it without my help, and that he must put into trying all the strength of muscle and heart that he had before I would help or else suffer . . . why, then he was all mine."

Steve sat down with a surprised ejaculation and the other smiled grimly.

"It works, with dogs and with men. There are few outlaw dogs, just as there are few outlaw men. Give a man or a dog an idea of his duty, of his job, and see that he knows he must do it—knows clear down to the roots of his heart that he must—and there you are.

"If I had shot him that day after he rushed my babies it would have been a coward's way out and they would have known it. You gave me the chance to finish what I had planned to do without . . . without h—l coming to my home. That is why I have been waiting to do something, anything, for you."

Steve, oddly touched, growled that LaFane owed him nothing.

"But men and dogs, LaFane . . . You've not always lived here then?"

"I have tried living in many places."

"And handled men?"

"Handled? Handled! I've herded men. I was a deputy warden in a big penitentiary once."

"Didn't like man herding?"

"Didn't like seeing them herded without a chance to find and unearth the thing that would make them fit and safe to walk and work alone, free. Some, of course, must always be herded: the weak ones. But so many of the others never have a chance, because of bad handling."

Drake thought rapidly as he received this confidence.

"You think, then, that if you had a chance you could break men as you break dogs?"

"I'm no breaker, I say. I can handle men, yes. That is an answer to your question. I have done it. I did it in the prison, a doctor and I. Between us we sent many on parole that might have been there yet . . . being broken slowly; what was left of them, you understand."

Steve locked his hands around one knee and stared out across the lake.

"Do you like to try handling men? Young men? Who are strong enough but who haven't discovered themselves yet?"

"No, I'm happy here, with the dogs and my family. But . . . you've a man in mind?"

"LaFane, can I trust you to keep a secret? A special, personal secret which involves others."

"I have kept it."

"What? You mean . . . you've guessed something?"

"I have not even told myself that you are not Young Jim Flynn."

"Well, how in— When did— Who told you that, LaFane?"

"You."

"I? I haven't breathed it!"

"No. You have said nothing. You have been smart and wise. But the first day I took the mail up to your cabin I walked in quietly. I thought you were out but you were sitting there at a table and you thought, even though I surprised you, that you put it away in time. But you did not. I saw it in your face as you looked at it.

"No man, you know, would look at his sister's photograph as you were looking at Kate Flynn's."

Steve felt himself flushing. He recalled how he had been re-reading her letters that first day in his new cabin and of how his heart had speeded up when he looked at her likeness.

"Well, there's nothing much for me to say!" he laughed, abashed.

"And no need of it. Your business is not mine. Why you came as you did, I don't know. I'm not curious, even. I know what you have done, which is to save Old Jim's hide for a time, anyhow. That is all that matters. He, too, is my friend."

"Thanks," said Steve, feeling that any words were inadequate. "I'm glad you found out about me for yourself. I was wondering how to tell it. . . .

"Now, here's my present problem . . ." and swiftly he told of how he had blundered on Young Jim, of how he had come to masquerade and of the worry which Franz's news today had given him.

"And if I leave the job and try to persuade Young Jim to stay away or to brace him up, things may all go to the devil before I can return."

The other agreed.

"Do you suppose you could do two jobs in one? Keep the boy away until we have a chance to see what can be done toward putting this thing really on its feet and, while you're doing it, handle him as . . . as you handled Duke? I can't keep this game up very long. But until Old Jim gets squared away somebody must be in charge who has a clear head and the respect of the men."

"You're asking that?"

"I am."

"Where is he?"

Steve pondered. "How much red clay is there in this country? Within a day's travel, I mean."

"Only in one place. On a portage between the Good-Bye and the Mad Woman."

"I came that way. And the bottom of Franz's canoe was smeared with it today. It was fresh. He had just come across the carry."

"If Young Jim is still on the Mad Woman and bound to come here, it will be across that trail. If the rest are with him, it may be not too easy." La Fane shrugged and rose. "I will do what I can do."

Then, without speaking further he walked toward his house. Steve stood on the beach watching him and thinking that, for such a situation, no better man could have been found to accomplish all that might be done.

But after LaFane had departed on his mission another problem arose in Steve's mind.

Mary Wolf had been headed for the Mad Woman. If Franz had been that way, might it not be that he had gone to look for her and cause trouble? But if so, he reasoned as this suspicion arose, she had either rebuffed or eluded the man. Franz had been alone today and he had it from Tim Todd that he had gone on down the lower river, telling some one that he was headed for the Laird's.

CHAPTER V

And that night, up the waters that Steve had descended on his way to Good-Bye went another lone man in a canoe. LaFane's pack was light and he paddled steadily until he was well past the wood camp. Steve had described the camping spot where he had met Flynn but none with a good eye would have needed the directions he gave because smoke was rising from a camp-fire against the afterglow.

LaFane idled along waiting for night to come, then he let his canoe drift into the rushes and sat listening to the sounds that came from the camp.

Sounds of revelry, they mostly were; the snatch of a song, loud laughter, a careless oath occasionally.

For a long time LaFane sat listening and watching; then he backed noiselessly away, paddled half a mile, landed, concealed his canoe in the bushes and slept in a single blanket.

He did not sleep long. He was up while many stars were still brilliant, folded his blanket, ate a cold snack and waited for the coming dawn.

When light was strong he began to walk slowly and silently through the timber. He did not stop until he could observe the activity about the camp.

Smoky, the guide, was up. Two of the three young men who comprised the party were washing in the lake.

"Ready for cakes now?" Smoky asked.

"Dick and I'll be. Jim, though, he's dead to the world."

The guide grunted and drew the coffee pot from the fire.

LaFane heard the others try to rouse Flynn, saw them finish their breakfast and then begin rigging their rods.

"Last day!" said one. "D—n, what a head!"

They embarked shortly, the three in one canoe. LaFane went directly to the tent, jerked the flap aside and looked down at the sleeping figure there.

The face was upturned. It would have been a handsome one under normal conditions, but now it was lined deeply with the ravages of dissipation.

LaFane stooped. "You!" he said gruffly. The sleeper made no response. "Jim!" He shook the lad's shoulder but, except for a long breath, Flynn made no response.

The man went over the packs carefully and finally selected one that contained apparel which would fit the sleeper, discarding that which by any chance might belong to the others, and packing those belongings which were obviously Jim's.

This done, he carried the pack to the canoe on the shore and set the craft in the water. The other canoe had disappeared among the islands; no sound of human origin rewarded the straining of his ears.

LaFane returned quickly to the tent, slung the recumbent figure to his shoulder and bore Young Jim, with little apparent effort, down to the shore and laid him gently in the bottom, head on the duffle in the bow.

The boy mumbled in protest and brushed at his face. Once he tried to sit up but abandoned the effort and sank back to his stupor.

Observing this LaFane left him, broke a stick and scratched in the sand on the landing the following message in bold characters:

"On my way. Good luck. J. F."

With a grim smile he shoved off and paddled down the lake.

He kept on for an hour, watching the sleeping man with him until he commenced to show signs of restlessness. Then at a point of exposed rock ledge he halted and stepped out of the canoe. He made the craft fast and leaned down to shake the sleeper roughly.

"You!" he said. "Come out of it, now. Get up!"

"Lemme 'lone, fellers. . . . Gotta res'. . . ."

"Get up before you get hurt!"—sharply.

Young Jim came to life with a bewildered start. His perplexed eyes finally came to rest on LaFane's face.

"Who the devil 're you?" he demanded.

"My name's LaFane. Come along. We're going to make camp."

This was spoken casually as though they were old companions.

"Camp? Say, where the devil are we? And what . . ." The boy frowned and made a wry face.

"We're on our way to Good-Bye," LaFane said. "Get out and have a drink; water, this time. It'll help you clear your head."

This suggestion coincided with a need, evidently, for Young Jim got stiffly out of the canoe, lay down on the ledge and buried his face in the clear waters of the stream. He drank at length, with frequent interruptions for breathing. As he did this LaFane bore the canoe up into a protecting screen of bushes, careful to disturb them as little as possible. There was a chance that those three back yonder would suspect something and come searching. He wanted no complications. Returning to the stream he stood looking somberly down at his charge.

Thirst slacked, mind somewhat cleared by the bathing, Young Jim hitched himself up on one hip.

"Now," he said, pleasantly enough, "what the h—l's this all about? How does it come that you're giving me orders?"

"I came after you."

"From Good-Bye?"

"Yes."

"Who sent you?"

"Never mind that."

The boy frowned. "Are we on our way there now?"

"Might say so. A roundabout way."

"What d'you mean by that?" He rose, belligerent now.

"We are going to Good-Bye when you're fit to go. That will be when you can be of some use there."

The lad's lower lip dropped and he wiped his hands on his hips.

"Say, LaFane, or whoever you are . . . how'd I get here with you! Who're you to tell me what I'm going to do? And when? Where do you get your authority for all this?"

"Here," said his companion, spreading his hands. "Just in these . . . if I need to exercise it."

His voice was almost gentle and the light in his eyes was far from hostile. Still, his answer beneath the quiet delivery had been hard as metal.

It was this last which the boy understood; probably he heard only that and his own face, with its marks of debauchery, went dark. He clenched his fists menacingly, a threat in his voice.

"That's not enough!" he said huskily and, stepping past LaFane strode up the ledge to where the canoe had been cached.

"Where are you going?" LaFane's question was stout, challenging.

"To get my outfit. I'm going back to my gang and d—n to you if—"

The grip of those hands on his arms checked both words and movement. He was spun about to confront a different LaFane, a man with glowing eyes and set mouth.

"You're wrong again," he said quietly. "You go where I take you; you do as I tell you."

"Like h—l, I—"

Using Soldiers
Destroying Our Nation
John D. Rockefeller

By ED HOWE

WE HAVE a good many professional soldiers who live in considerable magnificence and idleness. In our expensive forts cavalrymen devote much time to fancy riding not required in war; army posts are the mainstay of the aristocratic game called polo.

Since we pay an enormous soldier tax, why not make some sensible use of soldiers? Why not distribute squads of them over the country and require them to get exercise by chasing highwaymen, bank burglars, the radicals who bomb peaceful and useful business institutions, and beat up peaceable workmen? Why not a thousand soldier camps instead of a few dozen luxurious ones like the Presidio, a show place in San Francisco? Why not use the fighting men we employ at such terrific expense in maintaining reasonable order in a thousand different communities?

There is a man named Oswald Spengler whose writing one hears a good deal about. His book called "The Decline of the West," is an attempt to prove that the United States is going to the devil, and that nothing can stop it. Mr. Spengler does not specially criticize us for throwing our cookstoves and beds away, and going back to campfires and brush piles, except that his statistics seem to show that while nations always destroy themselves with dissension and false progress, our pace is rather more rapid than has been the rule in national destruction heretofore.

Civilization, Mr. Spengler declares, always destroys itself because people demand too much of it. After a man gets one bath room, and is fairly comfortable in his home, he demands two or three; it was lately charged against a prominent citizen of Texas he had nineteen. Now he has lost not only his nineteen bath tubs, but his house, and the fortune that supported it. His neighbors who had but one bath room took after this aristocrat, and caught him. They are all going to the creek for bathing now but they had an enjoyable fight.

Mr. Spengler believes the special speed we have displayed in going to the devil is due more to our editors than to any other cause. The American newspapers, he charges, have thrown away the brakes and pursue a wide open policy; they drive as fast in everything as their readers drive their new automobiles, and wrecks will inevitably destroy us a little earlier than has been the rule in older civilizations.

A few conservatives are begging for reasonable delay in traveling the road to destruction; for at least as much moderation as the Greek and Romans displayed, but ours is a fast age, and propably we shall continue to step on it.

• • •

Considering the many bad things I have known other men to do, I conclude John D. Rockefeller is an exceptionally good man. His father was a runaway, and deserted a good wife and her little children, but John was a good boy, and took care not only of his mother and his younger brothers and sisters, but looked up his father, and helped him, too.

When John had children of his own, he had family prayers, and tried to bring them up right.

The Rockefeller foundation, the greatest philanthropy in the history of the world, is still on its feet, although possibly staggered a little by the recent depression. At ninety-three old John is still pursuing his policy of saying little, and doing much.

In moral conduct, finance, fairness, common sense, his average is higher than that of any other man I know from reading the papers. Of course he has been rich a long time, but this is the most excusable of faults, since every one is trying to be guilty; and I predict that after he has been dead long enough for gossip to get around to the truth (which it always does) his monument will be a little higher than those of Gothe, the poet, Hannibal, the general, or Plato, the philosopher.

After all, it is the Butter and Egg Man who is in position to most influence and better the world by making a high average in the practical things.

Writing a bit of poetry, winning a fight, or tossing off a philosophical gem, are small matters compared with the daily Butter and Egg struggle; in this John D. Rockefeller has long been a master, and made an exceptionally high average from a boy of fourteen to an old man of ninety-three.

There is a bold, merciless thing called Right. Opposed to it is a timid thing making explanations called Wrong.

• • •

I have never known anyone not willing to go too far in publicity. President, king, senator, matinee idol, bride, hero, farmer who has killed a wolf, poor boy who has become a prominent business man, always consents to be photographed beyond the point of modesty when the newspapers take after them.

• • •

A man cannot always be a gentleman; there is too much of the devil in him, but he can always hope to be a little more gentlemanly tomorrow than he was yesterday, and profit by it.

On the Funny Side

PERPLEXED MEMORY

"I'm beginning to wonder," said Farmer Corntossel, "whether I'm not getting symptoms of this ailment they call amnesia."

"Can't you remember your previous identity?"

"Only in part. I can't remember I am the same old farmer who used to have a market for more crops than he could raise and nobody comin' around asking for work."

Bouncer

A safe deposit box holder, while signing the card for entrance to his bank's vault, said to the attendant: "Your rubber goods department, please."

"Why, what do you mean?" was the response.

"I want to go where you keep for me the coupons which, after they are deposited, bounce back like rubber balls," was the comeback.—Vancouver Province.

Bovine Hoarding

The city dweller was reading a newspaper when he was heard to exclaim. "Even the cows are doing it now!"

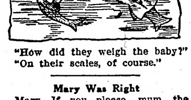
"Doing what?" inquired his wife.

"Hoarding," he replied.

"Not really hoarding?" his wife echoed.

"Sure," said her husband. "Right here in the headline it says, 'Light native cow hides 7c.'"

IN THE FISH FAMILY



"How did they weigh the baby?"
"On their scales, of course."

Mary Was Right

Mary—If you please, mum, the cat's had chickens.

Mistress—Nonsense, Mary; you mean kittens.

Mary—Was them chickens or kittens you brought home this morning?

Mistress—Chickens, of course.

Mary—Well, mum, them's what the cat's had.

Public Speaking

"Did you ever do any public speaking?" asked the man in the largest rocker.

"Well," replied the chap on the three-legged stool, "I proposed to a girl in the country over a party line."

WRITER DECRIES MODERN IDEA OF FORCED LEARNING

"Never regard your study as a duty," said Albert Einstein to the Princeton students, "but as an enviable opportunity."

Quite true! But how shall the student know this, if we persist in treating the university as a school in which tasks are assigned as a burden, and punishment is meted to those who do not do them?

If study is an opportunity, the only penalty for not taking advantage of that opportunity is failure to reach its goal. He that does not learn has thereby lost learning, just as he that does not eat has thereby lost nourishment. Why should it be anybody's task to force learning on him? If he does not want it, that is his verdict that he has no use for it. Probably he is right.

Primary learning, for children, is a duty. They do not know why they need it, and they may not want it. But, since they will be a burden to others when they grow up, if they do not learn, we have laws to compel them to go to school, and we hire taskmasters to make them study.

But not higher learning. Nobody needs that unless he does need it, and he is the best judge of that. The university should offer learning to all who wish it and are able to receive it. Why force it on others or think it anybody's business but theirs whether they choose to take it?—San Francisco Chronicle.

Behind the Times

The Russian Izvestia reports that a Christmas message to the late czar and his family was received in Leningrad the other day. It came from a Siberian tribe which had not yet heard of the Russian revolution.

Timely Reason

Sergeant—Say, Top, how would you like to lend a friend a five?

Top Sergeant—Buddy, I'd like it, but I haven't a friend in the world.

Why Hospitals Use a Liquid Laxative

Hospitals and doctors have always used liquid laxatives. And the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form. Do you know the reasons?

The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be regulated to suit individual need. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will a mild liquid laxative irritate the kidneys.

The right dose of a liquid laxative brings a perfect movement, and there is no discomfort at the time, or after.

The wrong cathartic may often do more harm than good.

A properly prepared liquid laxative like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin brings safe relief from constipation. It gently helps the average person's bowels back to regularity. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is an approved liquid laxative which all druggists keep ready for use. It makes an ideal family laxative; effective for all ages, and may be given the youngest child. Troubles of the Automobile and Coal Industries—Bishop Cannon's Trial Begins—Working on the New Tax Measure.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

LABOR conditions in the Detroit area, mostly affecting the automobile industry, remained in chaotic condition, despite the partly successful efforts of government mediators. The strike at the plant of the Motor Products corporation, which had caused a shutdown of the factory of the Hudson Motor company, was settled when Edward P. McGrady, assistant to Gen. Hugh Johnson, laid before the strikers terms that had been accepted by the corporation. The workers agreed to the terms, which called for a 10 per cent increase in pay and arbitration of disputes over piece work pay rates. This enabled the Hudson plant to reopen.

The 1,700 employees of the Campbell, Wyant & Cannon foundry at Muskegon, Mich., struck. The concern makes castings for automobile builders. The 4,600 employees of the Nash Motor company still were on strike at Kenosha, Wis.

The Mechanics Educational Society of America, an organization of tool and die makers, had voted to strike unless executives of jobbing plants met their demands for a 20 per cent pay increase and 36-hour week.

There was a strike by 800 employees of the Detroit-Michigan Stove company who demanded a 20 per cent wage increase, and pickets attacked men who approached the plant to work.

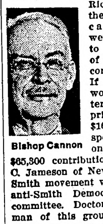
Industrial plants in Connecticut were involved in numerous strikes and labor disputes. The attitude of the workers was expressed by John J. Egan, secretary of the Connecticut Federation of Labor, who said: "No company should declare any dividends until the 1929 wage level is restored."

ADMINISTRATOR JOHNSON'S order to the bituminous coal industry to put into effect a seven-hour day and new minimum wage rates was bitterly attacked by southern coal producers at a code revision hearing in Washington. Especially objectionable to the Alabama, Tennessee and Kentucky operators was the reduction in wage differentials accorded southern coal fields.

CHICAGO business leaders are unanimously opposed to the Wagner labor disputes bill, George W. Young, president of the Chicago Association of Commerce, told a senate committee.

Mr. Young said the real purpose of the act was to force unionization of business and industry under authority of federal law. Workers could no longer bargain through self-organization or individually, but would be compelled to bargain only through union labor organizations, whether that represented their real choice or not, he pointed out.

BEFORE the criminal court in Washington Bishop James Cannon, Jr., of the Methodist Church South, and Miss Ada L. Burroughs of Richmond, his aid in the anti-Al Smith campaign of 1928, were finally arraigned to answer to charges of having violated the corrupt practices act. If convicted they would face a possible term of two years in prison or a fine of $10,000 or both. The specific charge is that only $17,300 of the $65,300 contribution made by Edwin C. Jameson of New York to the anti-Smith movement was reported by the anti-Smith Democrats' headquarters committee. Doctor Cannon was chairman of this group and Miss Burroughs treasurer.



Bishop Cannon

It was indicated that the defense would contend that Miss Burroughs did not have to report the $48,000 in question, arguing that it was spent within the confines of Virginia by the state anti-Smith committee.

One of the first government witnesses was Rev. Arthur J. Barton, Baptist minister of Wilmington, N. C., and co-organizer with Doctor Cannon of the Asheville meeting.

"SOAK the rich" forces were defeated when the senate rejected an amendment to the revenue bill by Senator La Follette, Wisconsin Republican, for a big increase in surtax rates.

The vote was 47 to 36. The party lineup showed 25 Democrats, 10 Republicans and one Farmer-Laborite for the amendment, with 30 Democrats and 17 Republicans against it.

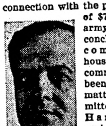
DESPITE the opposition of the house leaders and the doubt of its approval by the President, Senator Couzens persisted in his effort to put through his amendment to the tax bill calling for a flat 10 per cent increase in all income tax returns. Chairman Pat Harrison of the senate finance committee had approved it as an emergenccy measure and showed no disposition to reconsider.

Under the Couzens proposal, a person subject to a normal tax of $100 on his 1934 income would pay $110.

"Nothing has arisen since the President left the Capital, so far as I can see, to justify the imposition of these new and higher levies upon the American people," said Majority Leader Joseph W. Byrns, Democrat, Tennessee, of the house.

The house Democrats see the danger of raising all income taxes in an election year; and, besides, they are a bit tired of being forced to accept senate alterations of legislation on which the house already has expressed itself.

THAT Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, chief of the air corps, and others acted in "violation of the law" in connection with the proposed purchase of $7,500,000 worth of army airplanes, is the conclusion of a subcommittee of the house military affairs committee that has been investigating the matter. The subcommittee also found that Harry H. Woodring, assistant secretary of war, had attempted to assure competitive bidding for the airplanes and thereby comply with the law and the intent of congress.



Gen. Foulois

The transaction in question dates back to the first of the year. Army officers, asking a public works allotment to buy airplanes, made arrangements to purchase them from special companies without competitive bids.

THREE Republican senators, Warren R. Austin of Vermont, James J. Davis of Pennsylvania, and W. Warren Barbour of New Jersey, introduced in the senate an amendment to the air mail act which would compel the restoration of the canceled contracts to private operators until fraud, if any, be proved.

The amendment also fixes future compensation for the carrying of the mails to two mills per pound mile plus a subsidy frankly provided for the purpose of creating financial inducement and incentive to private operators to develop aeronautical industry through competition, according to an announcement by the three senators.

"The amendment attempts to assure the future status of the air mail operators and remove uncertainty and insecurity in order to encourage long time planning," a statement read. "It is beyond question that commercial aviation is vital to our national security and already has become an essential service for the business of our country."

The air mail industry is in danger, Senator Austin declared, of being set back to the chaotic conditions of five years ago unless the amendment is adopted.

OFFICIALS of the Public Works administration were elated by a report received from the F. W. Dodge corporation which indicated a pronounced spring increase in job-creating building activity in which the federal public works program was a leading factor.

Reporting on the volume of contracts awarded in March for both publicly and privately financed building in the 37 states east of the Rocky mountains, the Dodge corporation informed the PWA that $179,163,000 of contracts were awarded last month compared with $96,716,000 in February. Publicly financed building accounted for $126,210,000 of the March total, and privately financed building for $52,953,000.

The $126,210,000 of publicly financed work contracted for last month is about five times the amount contracted for in March of 1933 and nearly three times the amount contracted in March of 1932, according to the report.

The bureau of foreign and domestic commerce of the Department of Commerce announced that rapid progress was being made in assembling detailed statistics on the physical condition of homes, which are expected to be of value in federal and local projects for renovation and slum clearance.

WILLIAM WALLACE McDOWELL of Butte, Mont., the new American minister to the Irish Free State, collapsed and died of heart disease during a banquet in his honor given by President Eamon De Valera in Dublin castle. Mr. McDowell was responding to congratulatory speeches when he fell back into his chair and expired almost instantly. He was sixty-seven years old and had seemed to be in excellent health.

DEATH in extraordinary form came to more than fifty inhabitants of two fishing hamlets on the Nordals fjord on the west coast of Norway. A cliff weighing thousands of tons crashed into the fjord in the night and huge waves swept over the villages, drowning many of the people. Most of the frail cottages were utterly wrecked and boats were tossed high upon the land. The villagers fortunate enough to escape were without food and clothing until steamers from Aalesund and other nearby points brought relief to them. The scene of this disaster is familiar to many American tourists.

Measles Once Dire Scourge

Disease, Prevalent Just Now in the United States, Has Wiped Out Whole Populations in the Past; Few Escape Malady.

Practically every case of measles develops a mild "pneumonia."

For many centuries the disease was not differentiated from smallpox.

Nearly every individual in the civilized world has the disease, knowingly or not, at some time.

It recurs in periodic waves, with peaks for each community every two-and-a-half or three years.

It has been one of the most serious scourges of mankind, wiping out whole populations.

These are some of the curious facts pointed out by public health service doctors regarding the disease which has reached the highest peak ever recorded in the United States, with a record of nearly 31,000 simultaneous cases scattered all over the country.

It long has been known that the greatest danger from measles was the possibility of developing pneumonia. But, in a recent study of 900 cases by doctors at Bellevue hospital, New York city, in which X-ray pictures of the chests were taken, every one showed a mild inflammation of the lungs, called "capillary bronchitis," which constitutes mild pneumonia.

The disease first was recognized, it was pointed out, by an Arab doctor named Phazes who lived in the Tenth century. He described it as a mild form of smallpox. Not until late in the Seventeenth century did the English physician, Sudenham, finally distinguish measles from smallpox and scarlet fever.

During the American Civil war the disease broke out in a virulent form in both armies. For the Confederates it constituted one of the major causes of death and was an important factor in depleting the man power of the South. The Union soldiers had a low death rate. It is believed that more of them came from cities where, in common with urban population in general, they had developed a better immunity.

In 1875 a British warship carried measles to the Fiji Islands. Within four months 40,000 out of a population of 150,000 were dead. A few years later it was accidentally introduced into Greenland. It almost wiped out the Eskimo population. Ever since, extreme precautions have been taken against allowing an American or European to land on the island.

The cyclic nature of the disease now is thoroughly recognized, according to public health service doctors. These cycles do not embrace the country as a whole but vary with localities.

The measles curve still is rising, according to Assistant Surgeon General R. C. Williams, in charge of the public health service statistics. The peak may be any time between March 1 and May 1. There is no very specific treatment. The micro-organism causing the disease is unknown. It develops its own immunity. Practically every adult is safe from it.

Some of the public health service staff have resorted to the use of a serum made of their own blood as a preventive measure for their children—but the wisdom of this must be decided in each case and is up to the family physician. The efficacy is by no means assured.

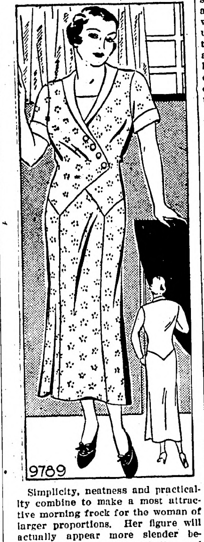
Before the days of Phazes nothing is known of the history of measles, but a good deal can be deduced. At one time it must have almost wiped out the human race. Only those survived who were especially resistant to its ravages. They acquired a still greater resistance. In some way they passed on either the natural or the acquired resistance to their children. Countless generations ago such a high resistance had been built up in the white race that a disease once deadlier than smallpox or bubonic plague came to be looked upon as a mild malady of children.

Nearly every one has measles between the ages of two and ten. The older the child, generally speaking, the less danger. A case in an infant under six months is practically unheard of. Every one is given a six months' immunity by the blood of the mother. If it were not for this protective measure a measles epidemic would probably be about as serious a blow as could fall upon a people.

There is a slight variation in virulence from peak to peak. This time the disease is not very virulent. Practically every part of the country is affected. Usually the disease tends to be concentrated in certain localities during a particular peak.

MORNING FROCK FOR THE WOMAN WHO IS OF AMPLE FIGURE

PATTERN 9789



Simplicity, neatness and practicality combine to make a most attractive morning frock for the woman of larger proportions. Her figure will actually appear more slender because of the unbelted waistline and the diagonal bodice and skirt seamings. A becoming collar is fashioned of contrast—sleeve cuffs and vestee match. A wash silk or cotton neatly printed will give delightful results. Long sleeves are included, shown in the small back view.

Pattern 9789 may be ordered only in sizes 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 requires 3⅝ yards 36 inch fabric and ⅝ yard contrasting.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Authority Shows That Beds Preceded Chairs

The bed is the ancestor of the chair. Such is the conclusion of Dr. Walter Hough, head curator of anthropology of the Smithsonian institution. He bases his conclusions on a systematic study of primitive furniture and primitive human postures.

His study of the furniture of the most primitive "houses" shows that rest was the prime motive. First appeared the rudiments of the bed when man learned to interpose some buffer between his body and the hard, cold ground. At first the bed was only a pile of furs, grass or leaves. Then came the banquette, a raised pile of earth, upon which the family lounged and slept. And the banquette was the forerunner of both beds and benches in some parts of the world. The chair made its first appearance in the form of a throne, either as the seat of a king or a god. From this it presumably descended, through various gradations, to become a common article of furniture.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Kindergarten Benefits

I fully believe that the right kind of kindergarten is the safest and best place for the young child. To my mind there they have established the ideal of freedom under self-control; ideals of health; the ideals of moral conduct; the ideals of citizenship, and the ideals of co-operation.—Nathaniel M. Salley, dean, School of Education, Florida State College for Women, Tallahassee.

NOT ACCEPTABLE WORD

Dictionaries and scholars frown upon the widely prevalent use of the word "enthuse." By them it is defined as a colloquialism peculiar to the United States and is generally regarded as a vulgarity of speech. Instead of saying "I am enthused over that," one should say, "That arouses my enthusiasm," or "I am enthusiastic about that." — Kansas City Times.

Canned Foods in The Antarctic

WONDER what Admiral Byrd and his men are doing down below there in the Antarctic. They say that time hangs pretty heavily on their hands occasionally, but there is one man in the expedition about whose activities one can make a pretty fair guess. That man is George Tenant, the cook of the expedition, who was also the cook at the time of Byrd's last trip.

Of course the expeditions take along tons of all sorts of food supplies, but their main reliance on the last trip was on canned foods. They took along on that occasion two hundred and sixty cases of canned vegetables, two hundred and twenty-four cases of canned fruit and many other miscellaneous canned foods supplies.

Turkeys, for instance, brought frozen from home were served on Thanksgiving and Christmas with canned cranberries, and canned chicken a la king, was a great delicacy which he frequently served on toast for breakfast.

Antarctic Ice Cream

But when the men called for ice cream, that was Tenant's opportunity to distinguish himself. He had brought along five hundred and forty cans of condensed, evaporated and powdered milk, and he solved this problem simply by thawing out some evaporated milk, mixing it with equal parts of snow, adding sugar and flavoring, and setting it outside. Then he reached out frequently to give it a stir. And in about five minutes of 70-degree-below-zero weather he had ice cream.*

In General Business class the freshmen learned that a clearing house is a great atvantage to the bankers in a large city.

Mr. Nybakken said if there wasn't such a thing as a clearing house there would be a terrible commotion at the end of each day. Mr. A would have to go to Mr. B. and get his money. Then perhaps Mr. B. would find he had a check from Mr. A's bank. Mr. Nybakken asked what could be done in such a case. One bright pupil said, "Go half way each."

AAA Dairy Plan Dropped

The Agricultural Adjustment Administration has decided not to undertake at present a dairy reduction program involving adjustment payment, according to word received from Washington this week by Dean W. C. Coffey of the Uuiversity of Minnesota Department of Agriculture.

This decision was reached by Administration officials following a series of regional conferences in which dairymen were given an opportunity to express their views of the administration's proposed reduction program.

The administration makes it clear that it has not lost interest in the dairymen's economic problems, but has decided to undertake no far-reaching program until dairymen are united in the support of one sound plan.

A limited program to eliminate diseased cattle from herds and purchase diary products for the needy may be carried out, however, with the aid of funds recently appropriated by Congress. Whole milk producers will receive the benefit of marketing agreements now in effect or to be adopted in the future.

The Holt Commuity band will give their opening concert here on Wednesday evening, May 16, at 8 o'clock. The purpose of this concert is to raise a little cash for the very much depleted treasury of the organization. The band needs money in order to function and, therefore, the directors of the organization have voted to make a small admission charge of 10 and 25 cents.

Besides the regular band numbers there will be other features for your entertainment. The members of the band have expressed the hope that they will see a good turn out for their first concert.

Your presence will be one way of showing your appreciation for the work done thru the winter months by the band.

Tickets for the concert are for sale at the various business places in town. Get yours early and be assured that you will not miss out on the first big concert of the season.

Show your appreciation of having a good band here by coming to the concert May 16. Remember that the people of this community expect the band to play at various programs and doings during the summer months and, unless we give them a little support when they have arranged a special program for us all, they will be unable to make further progress.

Buy a ricket now and tell your neighbors and friends about it. Plan to be here for the opening night and enjoy the program.

BANKING RETURNS TOWARD NORMAL

Reconstruction Finance Corporation Loan Repayments Show Banks Lead Procession in Recovery Movement

Indicating a rapid return on the part of the banks to a normal self-sustaining basis, 54 per cent of the loans which they made from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to tide them over the difficulties of the past two years have been repaid by them, it is shown in a recent official report.

The R. F. C. report, issued on March 6, says that the Corporation since it began operations in February, 1932, had made aggregate cash advances to railroads, agricultural and home loan agencies, insurance companies and various other institutions in the amount of $4,786,410,000. Of this sum banks and trust companies, to the number of 6,783, received actual cash advances of $1,520,540,000, but have already paid back $820,260,000, or 54 per cent. These figures are exclusive of $376,390,000 in loans authorized but withdrawn or not availed of by the banks.

Non-banking borrowers received R. F. C. advances in the amount of $3,265,870,000, and made repayments of $377,830,000, or less than 12 per cent. Among other classes of financial institutions reported as making high ratios of repayments are building and loan associations which had received $114,020,000 and have repaid $53,880,000, or over 47 per cent, and insurance companies, whose borrowings totalled $88,590,000 and repayments $34,340,000, or nearly 39 per cent. None of the major non-governmental financial groups showed so high a ratio of repayments as the banks and trust companies as a group.

First Rain This Year Came Late Tuesday

We had a dandy rain on Tuesday. It began raining about five o'clock and came a little hard to start with and had quite a bit of small hail in it. After half an hour of downpour it quit for a few hours and began again later in the evening and kept a drizzle most of the night.

This was the first rain in 1934 that amounted to anything and after the dirt got washed away things do not look so bad. Seeding was quite well taken care of by most of the farmers and the rain should be a big benefit to both fields and pastures.

My attention has been called to the drive some of the eastern cities are making on the "learn to swim" campaign.

This is highly commendable. All schools shoul teach swimming. It is a necessity in these days of advancement when people have such ready access to lakes and streams because of the automobile.

Every boy and girl after attaining a certain age should be given instructions in swimming. and it ought to be added to the regular curriculum. In this manner drownings can be avoided and the toll of deaths from this cause decreased.

Learn to swim. It is healthy. It is good sport. Some day it might save your life.

Renumbering Higways Today

Renumbering of the state highway system Friday, May 4 will be accomplished in less than one day, under plans just announced by the Highway department.

Maintenance crews in every county will start early Friday morning taking down old numbers and replacing them with new markers on each road affacted by the renumbering. Nearly 40,000 signs will have to be handlend by the crews to make the roadside markers conform to the new 1934 highway maps issued last week.

In renumbering the roads, the Highway department took the 140 new routes authorized by the 1933 legislature and consolidated them with the 71 old state routes and 16 old U. S. routes. Out of this total of 227 different routes, the department made a simplified system of 125 routes. This was done in the interest of public convenience; it was said by N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner. In the new system, U. S. routes will carry only their U. S. numbers, avoiding confusion resulting when the same road carries different state and U. S. numbers.

Maps of the renumbered system are availabe at all highway department offices and at most chambers of commerce, automobile clubs and other road information center.

Holt Cafe Was Robbed Again

Some sneak thief or thieves pulled another of their little jobs during the early morning hours of Wednesday, at the Holt Cafe.

This is the third time in the past few months that someone has broken into the place and walked away with a quantity of merchandise and small change

This time they took only cigarettes as far as the check-up showed. They also were so particular that they took only the best brands, leaving the cheaper kinds scattered on the floor. The burglars had unlocked both the front and back doors, leaving them open when they departed. Mr. Ness reports that about two hundred dollars worth has been taken in the past raids on his place of business.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout, and adds to Franz's hate by driving him away from Mary Wolf, Indian girl whom he has been abusing. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up.

—9—

And Jim, breaking loose, swung quickly, his savage blow landing on the older man's cheek.

It was a stout blow, strong enough to rock LaFane, but it was the only one Jim struck. A hard, broad palm smote his own face, he was lifted from his feet, swung about, shaken like a child.

The boy kicked and swore. He struggled to get free and strike back. LaFane, with a pivoting movement of his body, flung him sideways into the cold, sparkling waters of the Mad Woman.

Jim's oaths were cut short as he went under and when he came up, shaking his head to clear his eyes, he was gripped again because LaFane had plunged in after him. He was gripped and shoved under; held there an instant, jerked to the surface and held helpless, face to face with his captor.

"I could cuff you again," LaFane remarked, almost casually. "I could hold you here until you were quite miserable. There is nothing I could not do to show you who is the stronger."

LaFane's feet touched bottom. He backed into shallow water, dragging the boy with him, still retaining that prisoning grip.

"Shall I show you more of my authority?" he asked. "Shall I make you madder?"

The lad, quivering with rage, looked into that face so close to his. He saw strange lights, a queer smile, not without an element of gentleness beneath its hard quality.

"D—n you, I hate you, whoever you are!" he said between clenched teeth.

On that LaFane let go his hold and gave one of his short, dry laughs.

"Fine! We understand each other . . . perhaps. Come along."

He waded ashore and picked up his pack.

"Bring yours," he said as he slipped his arms through the straps.

"And what if I don't?"

"You will. I'm going into the timber. You hate me enough to want to get back at me and you can't unless you are near me."

With a shrug, Young Jim stooped and shouldered his own pack.

"Where do I get my chance to get back at you, then? Where are you taking me?" he demanded.

"On a trail that may not be too easy," was the reply.

* * * * * * *

A week later Steve returned to his cabin early one evening with the intention of writing at length to Kate Flynn and found Mary Wolf sitting on his doorstep.

"Hullo!" he cried in surprise. "What's the trouble, Mary?"

"I got no trouble," she said. "Franz, he is scared by you. Today I met him by wood camp. He called me names but he did not try to make me go by him. He is scared."

The glint of a smile, like one of extreme satisfaction, showed in her eyes.

So, Steve reasoned, Franz had been braving his admonitions and was in pursuit of Mary when he stumbled on Young Jim Flynn, and now, with the threat of being called to answer the charge of making an attempt on another's life hanging over his immediate future, he had other things on his mind than trying to force the girl to do his bidding.

"But he might do more than call you names another time, Mary. The best place for you, I'd say, is where you won't be meeting him. What are you back here for, anyhow?"

"Oh, something," she said and looked away indolently. "When something wild is scared, look out."

"Oh, so you're warning me against Franz?"

"May-be," she said idly and rose. "Good-by. I go by camp, now."

"Where's your canoe?"

"Camp."

"You walked clear here, Mary?"

"It is shorter."

"But haven't you grub to carry back?"

She smiled almost childishly.

"I just bring something. I go back now."

Her manner puzzled Steve but he did not question further.

"Well, you'd better get along to your father. He looked to me when I saw him as if he were too sick a man to be left alone long at a time. Stay away from here where you might be bumping into Franz; and if he locates your camp move to another place."

"Good-by," she said and moved on down the trail, light and graceful on her moccasined feet.

The "something" which she had brought with her on that long trek through the timber he discovered when he entered his cabin. On the table rested a box made of birch into which porcupine quills had been worked in elaborate design. In one corner was a blue flower and diagonally across the cover, worked in red, was the word Gim.

Drake experienced an odd emotional reaction. He had given the girl aid when she was in need. At the time she had returned him not so much as a word or a look of gratitude. But she had gathered her raw materials and treated them and put into this gift all the skill and patience which were her heritage. Even the misspelling of the name she believed was his, so typically an Indian mistake, added to the value of her service in his estimation. Then, to deliver it, she had walked for a day through the woods and now, though the sun was down, she was setting out for the long return journey.

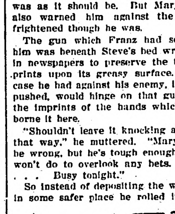
"Well, old son, you've made a hit!" he said aloud and laughed carelessly, but his easy words and manner were only devices to cover the profound embarrassment he experienced at being the recipient of such a generous gesture of gratitude and devotion. . . .

So Franz was scared, was he? That was as it should be. But Mary had also warned him against the man, frightened though he was.

The gun which Franz had set for him was beneath Steve's bed wrapped in newspapers to preserve the fingerprints upon its greasy surface. The case he had against his enemy, if ever pushed, would hinge on that gun and the imprints of the hands which had borne it here.

"Shouldn't leave it knocking around that way," he muttered. "Mary may be wrong, but he's tough enough so it won't do to overlook any bets. Well . . . Busy tonight."

So instead of depositing the weapon in some safer place he rolled it in a grain sack and gave it somewhat better temporary hiding inside the leg of a pair of breeches which hung against the wall. . . .



"D—n You, I Hate You, Whoever You Are!"

The weather was dry. The sun shone hot, unobscured by clouds. Nights brought little dew; the wind blew constantly, licking moisture from the soil.

It was a period of great forest fire hazard, the sort of weather to keep any logger continually on edge.

The response from Kate Flynn to Steve's telegram was a letter filled with mingled hope and doubt, and he saw that his first determination not to risk revealing the game he played by writing to her would not do at all.

"Please, please, Duffer, tell me the whole story!" she begged. "You are on the job after a long and unexplained delay; that is all I know. Tell me about yourself; about the job, next. Mac's word that the railroad is blocked is too heavy a secret for me to carry much longer and I don't dare tell Dad yet." . . . Later, in a burst of girlish sentiment: "I love you more dearly than I shall ever love any man but one. I lie awake nights thinking about you and wondering about you. I'm with you always, Duffer, pulling for you, fighting for you, but I'm on my knees, now, begging you to tell me everything. . . .

"You've a good mind, Jim, a great body; you've had every chance to make good and justify our faith in you but up to the present you've failed. Now, here is the one biggest chance and, honestly, there are times when I feel I'll go wild if I don't know that you are acting as you know you should."

Other letters such as this arrived with every mail which reached Good-Bye and from them and the photograph which he cherished Steve constructed for himself a girl of ever increasing charm.

He debated at length over the first letter he wrote. An old typewriter was in camp which obviated the chance that the girl who read to Kate might come upon Young Jim's handwriting in office files and betray the secret.

He did not attempt too much deception: "I was drunk as a fool for two weeks," he began, feeling that Kate was the sort who would prefer blunt truth. "But I am on the job now, and things aren't as bad as they might be." He proceeded with a truthful account of the situation as he had found it.

Her response touched him deeply:

"You seem so changed. You don't write as you used to. What's happened, Duffer? Has the iron, like Dad's, finally come out? Have you finally got the old hooch appetite whipped? I'm praying for it every hour, of course. I can't help but feel that the man who wrote this letter has something to step up and deliver. We'll fight it through together until the old Dad comes up from the rear and begins to lead again. That's a promise!"

He wrote other letters and, at night, at odd times during the day when the mind of a man engaged with such a job should have been busied with sterner matters, he found himself thinking of Kate Flynn.

At the beginning he had left her photograph on the table in his cabin; now, he carried it in his shirt pocket and when alone in the woods often looked at it almost furtively. Now and again, thinking of the girl he would mutter:

"I'll pull it through. We'll pull him through . . . for you. . . ."

* * * * * * *

Steve and McNally were together one day, caching new fire fighting equipment in strategic places.

"Seen Franz the last few days?" Steve asked.

McNally shook his head. "Nope, but that ain't unusual. Times, we don't see him for weeks, but he's always in the country."

"Bad sort to have loose, wouldn't you say?"

"You bet! He don't like Polaris and, course, he don't like you, Jimmy. Still, it'd take a fox to watch him. Might be down at the Laird's."

"How does he get his drag with the old fellow?"

"Got me, unless it's because he's young. MacDonald ain't ever warmed up to any of us old hands; never made friends with anybody in town or out here in the bush. Seems as if he don't care if he never sees anybody but his Injuns and Franz.

"You got to hand it to Franz! He's as slick as they get. He even fooled Katie good and plenty. It looked for a time that summer two years back that she was goin' to fall plumb in love with him. But she found him out and afore any the rest of us did. He was real cut up when she told him to git, he was!"

A sharp tingle of jealousy ran through Drake and he smiled. Jealous of a man who had once known the favor of a girl he had never seen, whose voice he had never heard!

McNally went on: "But 'bout him 'nd the Laird, I dunno. If he is after th' Laird's timber for Benson looks like he had the inside track. It ain't price, you see. Three hundred 'nd twenty thousand was what your daddy estimated it was worth; that's what he offered. MacDonald said it was a fair price but he just naturally didn't want to sell. . . . The thing is that if you had his stuff at a fair price th' banks might loosen up a little."

"Yeah. The banks. It'd give us time to turn around."

"'Nd time's what you need, Jimmy! It's gettin' a'mighty short."

The older man talked on, outlining the possible, the even probable disaster which was to overtake the Flynn interests, while Steve turned his thoughts to the Laird. He had learned all he could of the old recluse but, reviewing it all, only one really significant thing had ever been said to him about the man and this by LaFane. Some men, the dog handler had said, are so constituted that they will yield no measure of admiration to another until he can best them at something they want to do. Was that the key to MacDonald's friendship? Did LaFane know or was he guessing? He did not strike Steve as a man who guessed often.

* * * * * * *

Miles away, before a meager shelter made of a single tarpaulin, LaFane was making coffee.

To one side sat Young Jim Flynn. A half hour before he had delivered an ultimatum, declared that he was going to take the trail back to the Mad Woman, launch his canoe and go his own way.

"No. You are not going," LaFane had said.

"Who'll stop me?"

"I will."

"Then be about it!"

In great rage the boy had hurled himself at the older man. His assault was furious, backed by returning strength. LaFane had slapped him but that did no good, this time. So he struck, just once, sending the boy sprawling. Then he stood over him, smiling oddly.

The Welsh

The Welsh are, in the main, the modern representatives of an ancient Celtic people which occupied the southern part of Britain. These sought the remoter regions of the island when the invaders came. They are far from being an unmixed stock, however. The name Welsh is akin to that of an old tribe of Gaul. It entered the Germanic tongues with the meaning of "foreign."

Diplomatically she suggested:

GREAT CITY'S DECLINE

Medinacelli, Spain, once a prosperous city of 15,000 inhabitants, is slowly decreasing in size and, it is now feared, will disappear within a few years. Recent visitors report that the population, which was 5,000 only 40 years ago, is now barely 700. At the beginning of the Sixteenth century Medinacelli was a splendid Castilian metropolis, a coveted Moorish stronghold and the key of the province of Aragon. Weavers filled the streets after the day's work and proud aristocrats strolled past grilled windows through which beaming black eyes gleamed at them. When the dukes and their families, who lived in splendor, passed away, others lost their livelihood and started the exodus.

President Tells What He Wants Congress to Do—Mussolini Tries Another Restoration Method—Senate's Tax-Boosting Bill.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, in a series of conferences with congressional leaders, made known his desires in the way of immediate legislation. First, he told them he would soon submit a new request for $1,500,000,000 for relief purposes, as was indicated in his January budget message. This bill will include several provisions — namely, a housing program and $500,000,000 for the public works program to aid employment. The relief will be made a part of the usual deficiency measure.

President Roosevelt

Next, Mr. Roosevelt wants a stock market regulation bill with better teeth than those in the much modified Fletcher-Rayburn measure. He desires, too, passage of reciprocal tariff, general revenue, municipal bankruptcy, and federal insurance on bank deposits measures.

In order that congress may get through and adjourn by the middle of May, the President is willing to sidetrack some of the administration measures, including the permanent air mail legislation and the Wagner bill to eliminate company-dominated unions. He was reported also to have expressed opposition to measures to create a central monetary authority.

The house, it is said, will be ready to adjourn by May 15, but there is doubt whether the senate will get through its work before June 1.

PREMIER MUSSOLINI of Italy has his own ideas of the way to restore prosperity, and they are utterly at variance with those of President Roosevelt. By his direction the council of ministers issued a series of decree laws designed to make the cost of living commensurate with the purchasing power of the lira.

The Italian lira now stands at 3 to 1 in purchasing power with reference to pre-war values, Il Duce declared. The cost of living on the other hand is 4 to 1 with reference to pre-war prices.

The two will be equalized, Mussolini and his ministers declared, and here is what they did:

Slashed the pay of members of the government 20 per cent.

Cut the pay of state and public employees on a scale ranging from 6 to 12 per cent.

Slashed various supplements and indemnities granted state employees and others from 10 to 50 per cent.

Ordered every landlord in Italy to reduce rents by 12 per cent in cases of individuals and societies, and 15 per cent in case of businesses and shops.

Reduced prices in co-operative stores and military co-operatives by 10 per cent.

President Roosevelt is right, not Mussolini, said the London Sunday Express in an editorial.

"Mussolini cuts all food prices and rents on all dwellings," the paper pointed out. "He cuts, too, state salaries in excess of £2 ($10) a week. Roosevelt works the opposite way by raising wages and prices all around. Mussolini wants to reduce the cost of living. Roosevelt seeks to increase purchasing power."

CERTAIN tax increases written into the tax bill by the senate and passed by that body are regarded by house leaders as quite undesirable. Chairman Doughton of the ways and means committee declared they were entirely outside the original intent of the new revenue legislation, and a fight against them was planned in conference.

When the measure reached the senate it contained provisions estimated to produce $258,000,000 a year in new revenue, chiefly by stopping the loopholes through which legal tax avoidance had been possible.

The bill fell quickly into the hands of the senate "liberal" element, and provisions were inserted to add $220,000,000 to the yield provided by the house. Also, the senate inserted the provision for publicity of all income tax returns, which has been proposed many times but usually knocked out before final enactment.

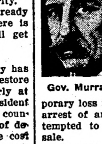
THE first measure in United States history to limit a crop was sent to the White House for approval after the house agreed to the senate alterations in the Bankhead compulsory cotton control bill. Final action by the senate was taken after the bill had been attacked earnestly by Senator Bailey of Texas and other southerners. Most radical so far of the New Deal measures, the bill restricts the South's output of cotton this year to 10,000,000 bales by placing a tax of 50 per cent upon all cotton ginned in excess of that figure. The secretary of agriculture is to apportion to each farmer, through his agents, the amount of cotton he may grow.

CONDEMNATION and seizure of private property in the interest of the administration's great housing program has been begun in Atlanta, Ga. Secretary Ickes, acting as Public Works administrator, asked Attorney General Cummings to file condemnation proceedings against 134 parcels of land there in the name of the Federal Emergency Housing corporation. In addition to these parcels the government is buying outright 70,000 square feet of land to complete what is needed for a $2,000,000 housing plan for negroes.

It was indicated that similar action in connection with housing plans will be taken in Chicago and other cities.

JOHN J. BLAINE, for years one of the prominent political figures in Wisconsin, former governor of that state and also United States senator, died of pneumonia at his home in Boscobel. He was one of the La Follette group of independent Republicans and was defeated for renomination to the senate in 1932 by John B. Chapple, who was beaten in the election by F. Ryan Duffy. At the time of his death Mr. Blaine was a director of the Reconstruction Finance corporation.

"ALFALFA BILL" MURRAY governor of Oklahoma, doesn't propose to permit resales of property for delinquent taxes in his state. These sales were scheduled in eleven counties, six others having already called them off. The governor called out his ever-ready National Guard, declaring that "protection for the homes of the people in stressful times like these is a vital policy transcending any temporary loss in taxes." He ordered the arrest of any county official who attempted to conduct a delinquent-tax sale.



Gov. Murray

The counties to which guardsmen were sent are scattered. In most counties the military department consisted of an officer and three men. Adjutant General Barrett said a greater number was not sent for economic reasons, but added that "more troops will be ready to go if necessary."

TWO court victories were won by the AAA in one day. In Chicago Federal Judge W. H. Holley upheld the right of the AAA to regulate the milk industry by means of set prices at which all milk must be purchased from farmers. This was in accord with other recent decisions.

In New Orleans the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals dissolved an interlocutory injunction issued against an agency of the Agricultural Adjustment administration, and in its opinion described the AAA marketing agreement for Florida citrus growers as being "legal." Without directly passing on the question of constitutionality of the agricultural adjustment act, which had been raised in the lower court, the Circuit judges said: "The act provides that such (marketing) agreements shall be lawful, notwithstanding the anti-trust laws. The validity of that provision is not assailed, and so the marketing agreement, being legal, is enforceable, even though other provisions of the act may be invalid."

JUST before he left Washington for Miami to meet the President and accompany him back to the Capital, General Johnson decreed a radical reorganization of the NRA along lines similar to those of the army. The most important part of this shakeup was the appointment of Lieut. Col. G. A. Lynch, an infantry officer of the regular army, as Johnson's right-hand man. Colonel Lynch, whom the administrator describes as "the most advanced thinker in the United States army," is given full jurisdiction over all matters not otherwise assigned. He has complete authority to approve codes, orders, amendments and other modifications, and may sign codes that do not require the signature of the President. The NRA administration no longer will be a one-man affair, and indeed, the ground is now laid for the retirement of General Johnson, which has been predicted for some time.

Col. G. A. Lynch

REDUCTION of passenger rates in the South and West proved to be a goose that laid many golden eggs for the railroads in those regions, but now the NRA, which has no control over the railways, is trying to persuade the Interstate Commerce commission to kill the goose because the bus operators are complaining. A hearing has been called in Washington for April 23 and the bus operators, the railway officials and the public will be heard. The first named propose that the railroads raise coach rates to 2 cents and pullman rates to 3 cents and that the motor bus code be changed to halt special excursion rates and chartering of buses. Most of the railroads are willing to do this

Plan Menus That Are "Different"

Not Necessary to Follow Stereotyped Form of Dinner Service.

The most charming way of entertaining, both hostess and guests will usually agree, is at the small dinner of six or eight. Dinners of this sort may be as formal or as informal as you like or as you can serve easily.

Dinner menus no longer follow a stereotyped plan. You may take almost any liberty you like with your menu, so that you choose foods which you know your guests like and which blend together properly. If you have a specialty of the house, you will do well to work it in, as almost every one likes a dish which is just a little different.

A popular hostess is sometimes asked by prospective guests to give them "that grand veal paprika with sour cream which we had at your house once." Another household is famous for its yorkshire pudding, which, by the way, it is a good idea to bake in the form of popovers. It will then be sure to be fluffy and light and you may dress it with dish gravy from the roast and get all the advantages and none of the disadvantages of the old-fashioned kind of pudding which was baked around the roast. Although at formal dinners butter is supposed not to figure even if bread is served, you will find that most of your guests will appreciate a hot bread with butter.

Salads for dinner should be light, of course. There is nothing better than a green salad mixed at the table. A reader who asked for some menus for simple dinners has requested suggestions and recipes for desserts, which are included among the recipes today.

Angel Food Dessert.

Bake an angel food cake in a tube pan and just before serving remove some of the crumb in the center. Fill hollow with strawberry ice cream. Frost cake with whipped cream and garnish with strawberries. Extra strawberry sauce may be passed at the table.

Marshmallow Cream.

¼ pound marshmallows
1 cup cream
¼ cup candied cherries or shredded pineapple
½ cup pistachio nuts

Cut marshmallows into pieces, add to whipped cream. Add cherries and pistachio nuts which may be cut in pieces or left whole. Put into a mold, chill several hours and mold and garnish with cherries and nuts.

Coeur de la Creme.

3 packages creamed cheese
¼ cup cream, whipped
Fresh fruit or preserved fruit

Beat cheese with a fork, add the whipped cream, put in greased heart-shape molds and set in refrigerator to chill several hours, and surround with berries, sliced fresh fruit or preserves. Serve as a desert.

Footprints Held to Be Millions of Years Old

Footprints left on a muddy shore by some of the first feet that ever walked the earth recently were brought to Mount Union college, Alliance, Ohio, by Prof. George F. Lamb of the geology department. The soft mud on which the long-gone animal walked was buried and ages ago hardened into stone. The five-foot slab recording their passage was found on a farm in Ohio.

The animals were members of the primitive amphibian family called Stegocephalidae, which came ashore and walked some two hundred million years ago.

There were 90 species of this family in the Coal ages, but the whole stock vanished as long as 125,000,000 years ago, according to Science Service. They all seem to have been short-legged, elongated creatures with armored skulls. The slab shows that the animal which made these tracks had four toes on each front foot and five on each hind foot. One of the interesting things about them was their third "eye." All well-preserved skulls of these animals have a small hole in the roof bones over the brain. Rudiments of this opening can be distinguished even now in the brains of all vertebrates, including man.—Literary Digest.

A Taste of the Tropics

THERE'S a saying that Nature's recipe for the pineapple was one-fourth fruit and three-fourths Hawaii. In other words, in the pineapple's appetizing tang, she shook us up a cocktail of blue skies and blue waves, of emerald foliage and gay blossoms, and of five star pure balmy air that is a tonic in itself. Connoisseurs of flavor declare they can even detect a touch of plaintive serenades from Hawaiian guitars and a dash of the brightly colored leis of flowers with which the Islanders bid departing guests "Aloha Oe!"

So, if we can't bask on white beaches with red flowers in our hair, let's drink and eat lots of the nearest thing we can get to undiluted tropical sunshine. Not only is it healthy—it's delightful.

Convenient Pineapple

Because pineapple is such a favorite to us dwellers in what we laughingly call the temperate zone, it is canned in more forms than most fruits. On the grocer's shelves you'll find pineapple juice, sweetened or unsweetened, pineapple slices, crushed pineapple and pineapple tidbits. Buy whatever type is best suited to the pineapple dish you have in mind. How about trying this way of using pineapple in tonight's dinner?

Tomatoes Stuffed with Pineapple: Cut the tops off four even sized ripe tomatoes, scoop out and drain well. To the pulp add the contents of one 8-ounce can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple from which the syrup has been drained, one small minced onion, two slices bacon, diced and fried, and crumbs to make the proper consistency for stuffing. Season to taste, refill the tomato shells, and top with more crumbs, this time buttered crumbs. Bake until soft but not broken. This serves [illegible]*

Peas are a Mainstay

JULIUS CAESAR was warned to beware the Ides of March. The housewife should also beware the "I'ds" of March—"I'd like to serve a hearty dinner tonight but I can't afford a roast." —"I'd like to fix something more appetizing but I haven't the time."—"I'd give anything if I could think of a new and interesting dish!" How often she says things like that in this month of uncertain weather and very certain appetites!

In Julius Caesar's day—and long before—the housewife found peas a first class standby in making her "I'ds of March" amount to something more than vague wishes. But the Roman matron never dreamed of the convenient canned peas which stand on the modern housewife's kitchen shelves waiting to help her out with flavor and nourishment at a very little cost.

A Sauce and a Salad

Here are two good pea recipes to remember when you want to serve the best dinner possible, and you don't quite see how you're going to do it. The next time you feel the "I'ds" of March coming on, dress up salmon or a meat loaf with Pea and Caper Sauce: Melt three tablespoons butter. Add three tablespoons flour and stir until smooth. Add the liquor from one 11-ounce can of peas and one and a half cups milk slowly, stirring and cooking until creamy and smooth. Season to taste, add the peas and two tablespoons capers. Serve very hot.

Pea, Celery and Onion Salad: Combine one 11-ounce can of peas and one cup of celery and marinate them in a quarter of a cup of French dressing for about an hour in the ice box. Add half a cup sliced onion, arrange on crisp lettuce and serve. This serves six.*

Record Set In Sign Changes

A speeed record was set by the Maintenance division of the Minnesota Highway department last week when it made a complete change of state route markers on 11,000 miles of trunk roads in less than one day.

The change-over was occasioned by renumbering of the enlarged system and also by the adoption of the standard black and white color combination for route markers, replacing Minnesota's previous black and yellow signs. When motorists went to bed the night of May 3 the 11,000 miles of trunk roads were marked with the old numbers in black and yellow. By noon May 4 eighty per cent of the system carried the new numbers in the new colors. The change was finished before nightfall.

Careful planning of the change over long in advance made the quick change possible. With ordinary methods the work would have required weeks to complete.

IN MEMORIAM

Gilbert Johnson — In loving memory of our beloved husband and father who died three sad yeors ago, May 9th, 1931,

Faith and Hope shall pass away
But Love can never die.
Though dearest objects of that Love
In silent grave may lie.

So sleep beloved, take thy rest,
Our loss has been thy gain;
Heaven is richer, earth is poorer,
Since Jesus called thy name.

The silent grief thats in the soul
No human eye may trace;
For many a broken heart lies hid,
Behind a smiling face.

We sorrow not as others do,
Whose hopes fade like the flowers;
There is a hope thats born of God,
And such a hope is ours.

Thou cannot come to us again,
But we shall go to thee,
When God's bright day of glory breaks,
And earth's night shadows flee.

Mud Lake Area Heads List

In connection with the recently announced program to purchase land for a series of migratory bird refuges from the Canadian border to Texas, J. N. Darling, chief of the federal bureau of biological survey in Washington said last Tuesday that the No. 1 project in Minnesota will be the 35,000 acres of land surrounding Mud Lake in Marshall county. "However", he said, "we have three other equally desirable locations for bird refuges in Minnesota, and if land owners in the Mud lake region insist upon unreasonable prices for their properties we will be forced to take other areas".

Many Lose Right To Drive

During April, 141 automobile drivers lost their right to operate motor vehicles on Minnesota highways, according to a report from the drivers license division of the state highway department

Loss of license was due in most cases to conviction on charges of drunken driving, while some suspensions were made for hit-and-run offences and reckless driving. The licenses were recalled for periods ranging from a few weeks to a year or more, depending on the offence.

All justices of the peace and other courts are required by law to report to the highway commisioner all convictioner all convictions under motor vehicle laws.

Trucks Orderad Off Road

The arrest of 18 operators of trucks with brakes so poor that the trucks were removed from the highways until repaired was reported this week by the Minnesota Highway patrol. Of 1,784 vehicles stopped during the past week for brake and headlight inspections, 539 were found to have defective equipment. Totals for April were 4,523 vehicles stopped with 1,509 having either defective brakes or lights. Twelve of the offending truck drivers were arrested at Northfield and six at New Brighton. Other inspections were conducted at Osseo, Albert Lea, Rochester, Paynesville, Renville, Olivia. and Red Wing. At Rochester 10 drivers were found with out drivers licenses. Of 250 stopped at Albert Lea, all had drivers licenses.

Safetygrams

I recently read where a drousy driver turned in a very good suggestion, and I want to pass it on to you. Here it is:

When you begin to feel drousy trrn on your windshield wiper. The constant motion before your eyes will help dispel that sleepy feeling.

Personally I have never tried it, I am just passing it on as it was given to me. However, there are many times when driving becomes monotonous and we are apt to feel drowsy while driving. This is especially true during warm weather and is apt to happen to any driver.

Give it a try sometime. It might be your answer to the problem and it might be of considerable help to you in avoiding drowsiness and accidents.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Frans plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Frans in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout, and adds to Frans's hate by driving him away from Mary Wolf, Indian girl whom he has been abusing. Frans discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Frans of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up. LaFane "kidnaps" the youth, and makes definite progress in the sobering.

"See? You're a lot stronger but you're no match for me," he said quietly. "I can handle you easily, yet. Aren't you ashamed of that? You're younger by twenty years; you're as heavy as I am, within ten pounds. By the book, you should be able to eat me alive but you can't. You can't get away from me, understand. You can't even make more than a good beginning at defending yourself from me. It is because you've been such a spendthrift with your manhood."

The boy, rising, sneered. "Preaching, eh?"

"Perhaps, in a way. Think it over, though: you should be able to be your own master and yet I handle you as I might a child."

Then he turned his back and made the fire and opened the grub sack as though he were nothing more than Young Jim's servant.

Only once did he glance at the boy, who had seated himself and, nursing his knees, stared down the little stream on which they had camped. Beads of sweat were on his brow, his lips trembled. LaFane smiled, then, as one will who has accomplished an end.

CHAPTER VI

Days before, Steve Drake had taken the chance that LaFane had known, rather than simply guessed about the Laird.

Thrice he had lain in the brush and watched the old man angle for the great trout, studying the white-haired recluse in action at his favorite pastime. He was a silent man. It was only when the fish showed that the Laird broke his silence. He would talk to the Indian, then, or to himself, and from his concealment Steve could see the gleam of the old fellow's eye.

Steve had discovered that in the second bend above, only a few rods distant, lived still another great veteran of the stream. The Laird's trout was a wonder fish, and no mistake, but this other lunker was of a size fit to scare a man, when he broke the surface in his feeding forays. He was a pioneer, an ancestor, the patriarch of them all.

MacDonald had believed the stretch of water barren, had fished it but little and, in consequence, was ignorant of the trout's presence.

This afternoon, leaving McNally at headquarters, Drake paddled down the river alone. He had the tackle with him and a goodly assortment it was, too. The rod was English, hand made, of the finest split bamboo. Steve had tried it on sizeable fish in the last ten days but he well knew that it, nor indeed, few others of its weight, had ever tooled a speckled trout as big as the one that lived alone above the Laird's personal quarry.

He arrived at the bend a full hour before sundown. Pulling his canoe out he set the rod. Then, wading out into the shallow water below the pool, he stood and waited.

The thing for which he had come did not show itself. He waited a time and then sat down, lighted his pipe and waited again. Within a half hour it came: a great bulge of water at the head of the velvety pool, a smooth upheaval as big as a dishpan which broke into flecks of foam and swept along down the current, leaving nothing to mark where the disturbance had been.

He began to cast. No fly was attached to his leader. The gut took the water without a riffle. Again he shot it forward and still again, and as it struck the third time the great fish rose once more, swirling almost against the strand to seize a floating insect.

"That's that!" he muttered in satisfaction knowing that though his leader was coarse enough to stand any pull which the rod could stand, it did not throw sufficient shadow to alarm the trout.

Steve stripped line from the reel as he made false casts to set the fly traveling in great arcs above his head. Then he let it fall on the water at the head of the pool. It was a good fly; his cast was splendid.

A dozen times the fly rode the pool without reward but then the fish struck!

He rolled his dorsal fin out as he carried the fly down and Steve, leaning backward, gave him the butt with all the strength in wrist and arm. He struck savagely, gambling his all on the strength of his tackle to turn the fish in his plunge for the depths.

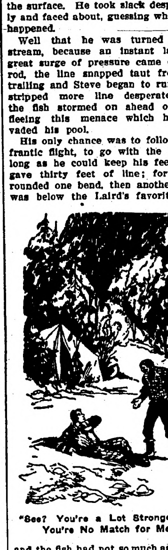
For an instant thereafter the pool was serene except for the V-shaped riffle where the leader penetrated. The trout did not even sound. He seemed to hang right there, no more than an arm's length beneath the surface, surprised, amazed, perhaps bewildered. . . .

And then a long, curling fin of water was laid back as the singing leader slashed in toward the far bank. Across and up the current went the lunker, boring into the depths, charging for the snag or rock which had been his private sanctuary and Steve let him go. Never had he felt such weight on a rod. The notion that he might turn the fish from his determined course had been childish.

Then, of a sudden, his rod was straight, his line floating in loops on the surface. He took slack desperately and faced about, guessing what had happened.

Well that he was turned downstream, because an instant later a great surge of pressure came on the rod, the line snapped taut from its trailing and Steve began to run. He stripped more line desperately as the fish stormed on ahead of him, fleeing this menace which had invaded his pool.

His only chance was to follow that frantic flight, to go with the fish as long as he could keep his feet. He gave thirty feet of line; forty; he rounded one bend, then another. He was below the Laird's favorite spot and the fish had not so much as paused to seek a snag or rock on which to entangle that leader. Far below him, then, the trout began to zigzag across the current and then Steve commenced to retrieve yielded line.



"See? You're a Lot Stronger, but You're No Match for Me."

Sheer strength would count, now. He could feel the old fellow worrying the hook, moving to and fro, straining to work in against a snag. The movement of the fish became more agitated. He nosed to and fro, he turned and circled briefly. He rolled over, flinging his tail into the air and bringing it down with a smash as if to break the slender strand which held him. Then he turned and darted up-stream.

Drake followed the fish and let out some line, but he did not run.

The trout sounded, nosed the bottom. He came to the surface with a splash and crossed the current, rolling over and over. Then he turned down the river again and worked for the opposite bank, sulking.

He lay in a deep place as Steve took line and edged along until he was directly across the current. He began to prod the trout, then, with sharp tugs on the rod, in an attempt to stir him to action before he could regain any measurable part of his lost strength.

The fish responded with a short downward rush, turned about and bored into the current again, forcing out a few feet of line. The great creature was tiring, now, and with his fatigue came fresh desperation. Hither and yon he charged. Steve knew his battle was not yet won.

No split second for thought of other than that struggle had been spared the man since the lunker rose to his fly, so he had not observed a canoe coming up the river, did not realize that he was within easy talking distance of its occupants. In the bow sat MacDonald, his white head bare, rigged rod ready in his hand.

He did not speak, did not move except to put the rod down. His dark eyes, lighted strangely, watched every move of the angler and when he saw that the fierce vigor of the trout's resistance was ebbing he motioned his Indian paddler to proceed slowly.

So the Laird was close enough to hear Steve's chuckle when, after a long time, the fish paused suddenly in his struggles and floated a few feet, writhing slowly on his side, opening and closing his jaws. He righted. He tried to work into the current again; turned reluctantly but helplessly, as the rod drew backward.

"Come home, old timer!" Steve cried as, reaching for his landing net, he walked into deeper water where the kingly old veteran drifted with the flow.

It was then that he saw the canoe and its occupants. He gave a sharp nod but did not speak. He shook out his net, stretched his arm. As the net all but slipped beneath him, the fish rolled over, churning the water and sank from sight. Drake straightened quickly, cautious lest he defeat himself in the very moment of victory.

He was within a few yards of the canoe, then, and as the fish sounded and came up again the Laird stirred. He snatched up his own long-handled net and leaned outboard, ready to take the fish as he came past.

"Don't do that, please! If I can't take him alone, I won't take him," Drake called.

He did not so much as glance at the Scot again. He came to a halt, lifted his rod higher, dragged the fish nearer. Then, with a sharp, decisive thrust of the net, he slipped it beneath his quarry, lifted him out with a swinging movement and relaxed his weary right arm. . . .

For an instant the fish lay still, curled in the mesh, gills working, and then he began to strain. The great fan slid up beyond the frame of the net and Steve, knowing the danger, knowing that no fish is an angler's prize until he is killed, waded to the bank.

A swelling sense of achievement filled him. He was heedless of the fact that the Laird had landed and was approaching.

When the old man came close, however, Steve looked up. He grinned because he had done what he set out to do and because he had done even more: taken this fish under the eyes of the old recluse himself.

But when he had looked into that other face his smile died. Never in any other countenance had he seen that particular rage which now flooded MacDonald's.

"Ye've taken my fish, mon!" His voice vibrated, a vein on his forehead leaped out into a welt.

"Your fish, Mr. MacDonald? I didn't think it was—"

"Didn't think! Didn't think! Meby so! But ut's th' fish I've worrked over summer after summer; th' fish I've dreamed on winter night after winter night! 'Nd who may ye be to come on anither's property 'nd poach 'nd pillage 'nd kill what's anither's right to take?"

His voice rose and in it was all the jealousy, all the bitterness that can come to one whose dearest ambitions have been thwarted.

Steve thought quickly. Instead of having the Laird's admiration as a reward for his accomplishment, he had won only animosity, and animosity is a poor beginning for friendship.

"You're mistaken, sir," he said. "This isn't your fish. Come here. Look up-stream. Watch."

He led the other a few paces to a vantage point, the old man suddenly silent but obviously suspicious. After a moment, in against the far bank a great fish rose.

"See! Isn't that where your fish lies?"

Almost reluctantly, the Laird nodded assent.

"This fellow of mine was two bends above. He lived all alone. He's too big to tolerate company. He's even bigger than the one you've been working on, if I'm any judge."

The Scot's fingers commenced to rummage in his beard. He drew a long breath and Steve felt relieved but on the man's words his heart sank again.

"Ay! Yoonger muscles! Yoonger wits! A bigger trout, likely, than yon fish." His tone was bitter. "Bigger, as ye say, than th' one who's defied me these years, but ut's unseemly for a yoong man to belittle th' abilities of his elders!"

He turned then toward his waiting canoe and Steve stood with hopes falling to ruin about him.

But nothing could be done except to stand there speechless and watch MacDonald slowly seat himself in the canoe. The Laird did not so much as glance backward at Steve. He looked older, somehow; his shoulders were not as firmly squared as they had been; something had aged him this evening.

Steve opened his lips, on the point of stammering an apology but when, after hesitating, he spoke it was no stammer, no attempt to excuse himself. Dangling the trout by the gills, he called almost casually:

"Mr. MacDonald, what'll he weigh?"

"Ha'n't ye a scale wi' ye?"

"No, sir; and it's a long way back to headquarters."

"What kind of angler are ye, not havin' a scale handy?" The Laird gestured for a halt on that. "I hae me doobts that he's so much heavier than yon. . . . Ay!" He rummaged in his beard again, thoughtfully. "Come wi' us!" he demanded. "Ut's my right to examine yer troot. 'Tis my belief, when I kill mine, he'll no be so mooch lighter. 'Tis yer obligation to gi' me 'n hour!"

"Certainly!" replied Steve, trying to keep elation from his response. "Of course, I'll go with you, Mr. MacDonald."

No word was spoken through the quarter of an hour it required to drop down to the great log structure which was the old man's retreat. Landing there, MacDonald walked heavily up the steps.

WHAT the people are really trying to achieve is for every day to be the Fourth of July, Christmas, Labor day, Washington's birthday, Sunday, Mother's day, New Year's day—holidays merging into each other; every morning's sun to light up a new day when we will have nothing to do but get in our cars and attend a picnic, liberty rally, or show. Of course, a few must work, to operate filling stations, hot dog stands and the like. That can be attended to by making slaves of the rich we capture and putting them to work.

The excuse for public extravagance in the United States is that only the well-to-do pay taxes, and that taxation is the quick and proper punishment for scoundrels. . . . If the reader will call on me I will show him the poorest man I have ever known. He lost his home lately through a tax sale after paying $836 in taxes on it during a long and struggling ownership. He had eight lots. They were assessed at $100 each, although he originally paid only $60 for all of them; at no time during his ownership were the lots worth half the amount at which they were assessed year after year.

I do not know how much longer I shall be here. I have a shorter expectation than many others, being older, but I am determined while here to pursue the course best calculated to produce most comfort.

I am still able to keep my hands out of the fire and prevent unnecessary and painful burns; I am still able to avoid shooting those of my neighbors with whom I disagree, or breaking into their houses. Such actions would land me in jail where accommodations are poor; I can better afford to practice honesty and remain at home with all its natural discomforts. I hope to continue to the end to avoid other bad habits which do not pay; gormandizing, swearing, drunkenness, cheating, idleness.

I do not much fear punishment after I am dead, but have lively appreciation of the punishment threatening during the remaining days of my journey.

If I am extremely practical it is what life has taught me; I have encountered nothing to cause me to greatly respect visionary things.

In the old days, when there was a disaster at sea, the women and children were first given seats in the life boats (it has never made much difference what happens to men). Moderns are forgetting that gallantry. In Iowa mobs of armed farmers blocked the roads and would not let milk wagons pass on the way to town with necessary supplies for the women and children. There were plenty of food supplies in the country, town people were willing to pay for them, and farmers needed the money, but the farmers were mad and determined to starve women and children to show their indignation.

We are becoming worse than the Russians. The Russian peasants have always been willing to sell food supplies to town women and children, if paid for; the Russian town men went out into the country and took things before the peasants rebelled.

I believe the American farmers should rebel, but in the name of common sense why don't they jump on the politicians who have robbed them, instead of innocent women and children?

God hasn't deserted us; it is our senses.

I know little of Sir John Falstaff except that he is acclaimed today as the world's favorite rogue. Sir John thought himself one of the few good men of his time, and said: "There live not three good men unhanged in England, and one of them is fat and grows old" (meaning himself). . . . Capt. William Kidd, another famous scoundrel, declared on the gallows he was a much wronged man. A book has lately been announced to prove that Captain Kidd was an eminent New Yorker, and a bold and capable navigator of high standing among the mercantile community in both Boston and New York; that the New York legislature voted him $750 for his services as a patriot; that a ship was given him by popular subscription because of his defense of liberty, and that he was hanged by guilty capitalists in England, because they knew that in his own city, where his virtue was known, he would have been acquitted.

I heard a doctor say of an ailing woman: "She is digging her grave with her teeth; I have warned her over and over, but can do nothing with her." . . . This surprised me: usually women are able to get along easier without things not good for them than men—every great feat of dieting I have heard of has been performed by a woman.

Cattle Possibilities

A sturdy breed of cattle, able to exist without grass, may be necessary in the future when the growing population encroaches upon the present great cattle ranges. The inhabitants of South Africa have a breed which came through the recent two-year drought in fine shape by being able to live on leaves of such desert bushes as could be found. These Afrikanders, as they are called, have now been introduced to Texas and their adaptation to the climate of the Southwest is being watched with great interest. Perhaps, by interbreeding, a type of milk and beef cow can be produced which could thrive on twigs, sawthat, cornstalks, leaves, or whathaveyou.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Professor Tugwell's Defense of the New Deal—Troubles of the American Railways—President Formulating Plan to Help Silver.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

MEMBERS of the American Society of Newspaper Editors assembled in Washington heard a warm and elaborate defense of the New Deal delivered by Prof. Rexford G. Tugwell, assistant secretary of agriculture, who is in part responsible for most of the recovery measures adopted by the present administration. Denying that those who are advising the President seek to bring about radical changes in the life and economic policies of the American people, Professor Tugwell described himself as a "thorough conservative."

"We have a saving irreverence of authority," said Professor Tugwell in speaking of the characteristics of the American people, "which gets us out of holes. These basic traits determine the structure of our laws and of our government. No one, with the slightest sense of history, would try to fit such a people into a regimented scheme, would try to think for them instead of getting them to think for themselves.

"Time will tell which in these times is the best American—those who believe that the racketeering, the financial juggling, the exploitation of workers and consumers must be ended once for all, and that continuity of industry must be definitely assured by whatever orderly political means can be found; or those who believe it more important that some few insiders should be allowed to manipulate materials, natural forces and social institutions for their own good at the expense of all the rest.

"Democracy has been living a precarious life among our business institutions; its enemies in this country were in a fair way to have it strangled and laid quietly aside until the New Deal came along. For they did not realize that real democracy cannot be destroyed without provoking a revolt on the part of its practitioners.

"Farmers were being starved off their land; workers were denied access to idle factories. A kind of specious and purely formal political process was being used as a stalking horse for privilege and threatening oligarchy. I have never lent myself to this supreme chicanery and I am not likely to do so as long as I keep any realistic sense at all.

"The New Deal is not something which can establish itself in the mind of a dictator or a small governing group. That was the fatal theory of the system from which we are turning away. Its base has to be as broad as the economy which has to be brought under control and as deep as the minds and the hearts of the people whom it affects."

SERIOUS times for the railroads are at hand. They face the possibility of a general strike, and the President has warned them that if they do not reorganize their debts at the expense of their stockholders and stabilize their labor conditions, government control or ownership may be the result. The wage controversy came to a head when the railway labor officials rejected President Roosevelt's request that the 10 per cent reduction be continued, and the railway executives said they would not consider any settlement more favorable to labor than this. Joseph B. Eastman, co-ordinator of transportation, who had been carrying on the negotiations, immediately withdrew as mediator, saying there was nothing he could accomplish. He asserted he believed the negotiations would continue under the provisions of the railway labor act. But A. F. Whitney, president of the Railway Labor Executive association, was far less hopeful.

J. B. Eastman

"Our only alternative appears to call for a strike ballot in order to prove our point in this matter," said Whitney, "and if this is done there can be but one answer from the men who have been receiving such a beggarly stipend."

President Roosevelt appointed Secretary of Commerce Roper, Secretary of Labor Perkins and Attorney General Cummings, a committee of three, to study the matter of stabilizing railroad labor and financial policies. He feels the railroads must wipe out the threat of receiverships by scaling down their fixed charges, and must settle their disputes with labor finally.

Holding that the railroads are far overexpanded because of their 1915-1929 building boom, the President feels that the carriers may never again be able to earn the interest payments on the bonds which were floated to finance the building of tracks, stations, and rolling stock.

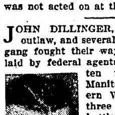
SENATORS who urge the remonetization of silver held a conference with President Roosevelt but received from him no encouragement for silver legislation, though no conclusion was reached. The possibility of silver purchases was discussed and the President indicated a disposition to give this matter consideration, but on the whole there was no indication the government will embark on such a policy.

The President indicated a desire to have further talks with the silver senators and there will be other conferences, according to Senator William H. King, Democrat, of Utah, chairman of the silver committee, and other senators who attended the conference. It was quite evident Mr. Roosevelt was not in favor of any mandatory legislation, at least, at this time.

Later it was reliably stated that the President was maturing a plan for international stabilization of currencies and that silver figures prominently in it. Mr. Roosevelt, it was revealed, favors the inclusion of silver in the metal base of currency issues to the extent of 30 per cent, the remaining 70 per cent to be gold. This change can be safely made, however, the President points out, only by international agreement whereby all the signatory nations would admit silver to their reserves against which paper money is issued.

In the London economic and monetary conference Senator Key Pittman offered such a plan, proposing that central banks keep 20 per cent, or one-fifth, of their metal cover or reserve for currency in silver. The proposal was not acted on at the conference.

JOHN DILLINGER, the notorious outlaw, and several members of his gang fought their way out of a trap laid by federal agents and possemen ten miles east of Manitowish, in northern Wisconsin. In three desperate gun battles three men were killed and eight wounded, and the bandits escaped into the woods. Three women who had been with the Dillinger gang were arrested. Two others were believed to have fled with the desperadoes. These two came from Minneapolis and were thought to have warned Dillinger of the impending raid on the camp where he had been for several days.



John Dillinger

Some hours after the battles in Wisconsin three members of the gang were seen by three deputy sheriffs in a suburb of St. Paul, Minn. A running gun fight ensued and one of the gangsters apparently was wounded, but the trio escaped and stole an automobile in which they headed for the bridge across the Mississippi river.

Federal and local officials throughout all that region were on the lookout for the Dillinger gang with the tacit understanding that the desperadoes would be shot on sight.

VARIOUS writers in magazines and newspapers tell us that the chance of war in Europe is remote, but almost daily circumstances come to light that contradict this optimistic view. Here are some recent instances:

Orders have been sent out for the twenty-year-old youths of Germany to report for duty in military or labor camps, which would indicate that Chancellor Hitler's Nazi government is quietly but efficiently providing military training for all these young men the same as if military conscription for a full-sized army were permitted by international agreement. Young men employed in factories and shops must belong to storm groups. Only storm troopers get jobs. Labor camps provide military training for those who, for some reason or other, did not become storm troopers. Many of these labor camps are virtually military finishing schools for storm troopers. Target practice and similar military maneuvers are staged.

Michael Kalinin, president of Soviet Russia, has demanded the "intensive militarization" of all rural Russia as part of general preparations for defense against war. He says: "We also must have a strong rear line connected with the front by thousands of threads. The chief task is to train women and children and others not fit for military service to carry out the work of collective farming when all able-bodied persons are mobilized, so that normal functions will not be interfered with. Those who remain on the collective farms must be prepared for everything. It is not sufficient that they know how to use gas masks. It won't be enough that they be able to manage a gun. They must have a good knowledge of the physical geography of their regions and be well versed in all forms of knowledge regarding the repelling of attacks on the civilian population. Particularly they must know how to resist raids from the air."

ALREADY suffering severely from drought, large parts of the Middle Northwest were afflicted by a destructive dust storm, said to be the worst in 20 years. The Dakotas, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas and Iowa got the worst of it, the dry soil being carried by high winds and in some places deposited in heaps greater than the snow banks of the winter. Farms, many of them already seeded, were denuded of fertile top soil. Winter wheat was badly damaged.

Britain Would Buy Island?

Possession of Sleepy Little Timor Said to Be Needed by Great Empire as Link in the Projected Europe-Australia Air Route.

The British government is reported by a news dispatch from London to be interested in Timor island of the East Indies as a possible sea and air base. An offer of $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 may be made for the island, it is declared. The eastern part of Timor and a tiny nick of the western part now belongs to Portugal, and the remainder to The Netherlands.

"Timor is the eastern 'jumping-off place' of the Sunda islands, that chain of land spots which is strung out from Sumatra eastward toward the north coast of Australia," says a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society. "It is about 300 miles from the Timor coast to Australia. Timor is thus a vital link in the Europe-Australia air route.

"Although Timor had a Portuguese settlement on its coast more than a century before Capt. John Smith with his band of English colonists disembarked at Jamestown; and although the Dutch landed on the island about the time of the Capt. John Smith-Pocahontas life-saving episode in Virginia, Timor shows little effect of its contact with the western world.

"About 300 miles long and averaging 60 miles in width, the island has but few settlements that even can be called township. Even Koepang, capital and largest port on the Dutch or western end of the island, has only 5,500 inhabitants; and Dili, which is the chief town in the eastern, or Portuguese portion of the island, can account for only 3,500 permanent residents.

"There are no railroads on Timor and one of the best roads of any great length is a horse trail that traverses the island. No cable links it with other islands. Steamships that touch other East Indian islands stop at Timor ports to deliver cotton goods, oil and wine, and to take away coffee, copra, hides, cacao, shells, wax and sandalwood which are the leading exports. And now and then an occasional visitor off the beaten tourist path walks down a steamship gangplank bent upon roaming over the mountains and through valleys where live most of the island's 800,000 inhabitants—largely a racial mixture of Malayan, Polynesian, and Papuan blood.

"The natives are divided into many tribes, ruled by chiefs whose jealousy of neighboring leaders, and land-grabbing habits, frequently have caused bloody clashes. Bows and arrows and spears are the war weapons of the natives. For hunting game, they use blow guns and small darts.

"While the loin cloth still constitutes the entire wardrobe of the men of some of the tribes, other tribesmen wear two-piece cotton garments and turbans. The women don colorful sarongs and shawls. From the appearance of exposed arms and other portions of the natives' bodies, it is evident that tattoo artists are kept busy in Timor. The tattooing is done with crude instruments and dyes which sometimes cause blood poisoning and death.

"There appear to be no limits, other than wealth and inclination, to the number of wives a tribesman may have. The native home is a round, one-room, wooden structure with a roof of grass or palm-leaf thatch, and not too clean inside or out. To appease the angry gods and to avoid destruction by evil spirts, the tribesmen place palm branches before fruit trees, houses and growing crops. Agriculture is carried on with crude, primitive implements; and, although there are many streams on the island, irrigation is hardly known. During the dry season vegetation bows to the torrid sun even to the extent of the trees losing their leaves.

"If the reported purchase is consummated it will not be Great Britain's first possession of Timor. In 1797 the British attempted to drive out the Dutch, then dominantly in control of the island. At first they failed. Later the British succeeded, and the Dutch flag was lowered. Portuguese influence then swept the island until 1814, when, by treaty, the Dutch resumed their old status.

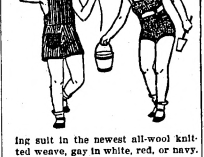
"Today the Dutch portion of Timor is about 5,000 square miles with 360,000 inhabitants. The Portuguese portion is 7,335 square miles with about 442,000 people. Both portions are mountainous. Many peaks are more than 6,000 feet high. Mount Rameau, near the center of the island, rises 9,600 feet."

Playtime Fashions for the Well-Dressed Tot

In the good old summertime, young fashion plates become sun-worshipers!

And for the fastidious two to eight-year-old, who wishes to devote all attention to boating, bathing, and basking, rather than to seams and buttons, here are the newest creations in playtime fashion.

Not following, but leading the vogue of the elders, the youngster these days who would be really in the swim, must have a two-piece bathing suit in the newest all-wool knitted weave, gay in white, red, or navy. Felt tabs attaching top piece to shorts add the jauntiest of fashion touches.



And what more fitting fashion for the fastidious sun-worshiper than a seersucker sun-suit as gayly striped as a stick of candy. Red, green, or blue striped suits—with fitted waistline and a catch-all pocket which is perfectly indispensable for precious stones gathered along the beach, will be worn this year wherever two to eight-year-olds are gathered for a quiet game of leap frog.—Carolyn T. Radnor Lewis in Child Life Magazine.

Comprehensive Map

After nine years of labor by expert topographers, about one-third of a huge map of the United States has been completed at Wellesley, Mass. When finished, this map will be 63 feet long, 46 feet wide and will show every mountain and valley in the country reproduced exactly to scale in height and size. Eventually, it will contain 900 blocks. When the map is completed, it is expected to be of invaluable service to rail and airline engineers in mapping new routes. It is constructed on a curved surface representing the exact curvature of the earth.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Humble Turtle as Model for New Railroad Coach

Whether the railroads, now predominantly equipped with heavy engines and rolling stock, can recover some of the ground lost to lighter competitors by adopting some of their methods of construction and applications of power has long been a matter of popular speculation. Technical problems have evidently stood in the way of transformations as rapidly as the imagination may have expected, but gradual developments in that direction are becoming increasingly apparent. A recent test run of a railplane type of coach between Detroit and Delta, Ohio, a distance of 154 miles, was one of the latest evidences of this. It was a self-propelled coach, said to be capable of running at ninety miles an hour without straining, but kept within 70 miles in its "breaking-in" trial.

To attain 70 miles, a representative of the laboratories where the car was constructed said, needed only half the horse power required by passenger cars of the conventional railway design. Light weight was obtained by use of materials adopted for airplane construction, and it was explained that there would be 500 pounds of weight for each of the 54 passenger seats as compared with 5,000 pounds of vehicle weight for each passenger in the "conventional railroad coach." It was asserted that the railplane could be operated at a passenger rate of one cent a mile, or less than the busses charge, and that berths could be sold at approximately the bus rate of fare.

In addition to these matters of popular interest, the technical matter of the streamlining of the car was described in a picturesque way. It had to be different from that of an airplane or a ship, it was explained, because a rail coach does not permit any such side slip. "The lines on a railplane are much more like those of a turtle than those of a fish," the spokesman said. "A turtle walking on the bottom of a river must permit water to slip under and over it with a minimum of resistance. That's what the railplane does with a beam wind." Who would have thought of a turtle as model for a vehicle capable of traveling at the rate of 70 to 90 miles an hour?—Indianapolis News.

Sportsmen in Move to "Restore" Wild Turkey

Keeping wild turkeys wild is the object of an experiment in southern Illinois, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. Under the supervision of the state department of conservation, a group of 100 birds has been placed on an island so that human contacts may be eliminated. The final result, the department hopes, will be restoration of the game turkey, bringing with it more sport for hunters.

The decision to isolate the birds was reached after efforts to raise wild turkeys on a state forest preserve failed because of the tendency of the bird to become domesticated. In other efforts of this kind, the turkeys multiplied rapidly but failed to develop a wild wildness. Efforts to put them on their own by taking them several miles from human contact were balked when the birds took to the air and flew back to feeding stations before the preserve workmen could return.

Friday Fish

"CHEER UP!" people used to say to a man who was in despair because he had been jilted—"there's plenty more good fish in the sea!" Today, to the housewife who's in despair because it's Friday again and all the fish store offers is halibut, the words of comfort are: "Cheer up! —there's plenty more good fish in cans!" If the fish dealer fails her, she goes on to the grocer's and finds on his shelves enough menu-inspiration for two or even three sea-food dinners a week.

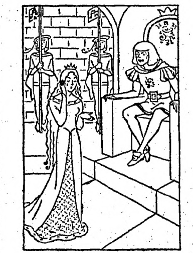
Around canned shad roe she can build a very appetizing meal. Shrimps—why not curry them? Crabmeat—why not serve a crabmeat and tomato omelette? And there's still plenty more good fish in cans—haddock, herring, mackerel, salmon, tuna, all very carefully selected and as nourishing as when they left their native waters.

Two Friday Dishes

Next Friday try one of these recipes which are quickly made main dishes that serve eight people.

Mackerel Shepherd's Pie: Drain a half a cup of canned peas and one 8-ounce can of diced carrots, and add them to two cups of white sauce. Flake a 1-pound can of fresh mackerel, and fork it into the sauce so that it remains in fairly large flakes. Pour the combined ingredients into a buttered baking dish, and pile fluffy, well-seasoned potatoes on top. Brush with melted butter and bake in a moderate oven until they are very hot and the potatoes are golden brown.

Tuna Fish and Rice with Caper Sauce: Place a large can of tuna in water enough to cover it and boil it until it is thoroughly heated. Remove the fish from the tin without breaking it, and place it in the center of a platter. Meanwhile boil some rice, drain a cup of it, and pile it in a ring around the fish. Slice three hard-cooked eggs and arrange them in a ring around the base of the rice. Add four tablespoons of capers to about two cups of white sauce and pour the sauce over the fish.*



Fresh Coffee

ONCE upon a time there was a princess who was setting out for a far country to marry a prince. To carry as a gift to her new husband, her fairy godmother gave her an emerald as big as a golf ball, wrapped up very carefully. "Now don't think of taking this out until you get there!," cautioned the fairy. "This is a special emerald. The air is bad for it." "What an idea!" thought the princess. And just as soon as the fairy was out of sight, she unwrapped the blazing emerald and showed it to her attendants. And with it she dazzled the eyes of many people she met on route. But when she presented her gift, imagine her embarrassment! The emerald was dull. The air had robbed it of its brilliance. It had no more sparkle than an egg.

Air Is Also Bad for Coffee

Perhaps this sounds like an idle tale. But scientists tell us almost the same story about the bad effects air has upon coffee. As if to warn us to shield it, nature wraps the coffee bean in thick, tough pulp. Once these wrappings are removed and coffee is roasted, coffee's "sparkle" is dulled every time it is exposed to the air.

The reason for this is that certain gases brought out by roasting coffee escape into the air, taking the aroma with them. In thirteen days after roasting, much of coffee's richness is lost in this way, and, moreover, it turns stale.

Vacuum Packed Coffee

Evidently the only way to bring coffee to your coffee pot with its strength unimpaired is to keep its gases in and the air out. This is precisely what is done when coffee is vacuum packed. When the coffee is roasted, before the aroma has a chance to escape, the surrounding air is sucked away, and the can is tightly sealed so that no air can creep in.

Thanks to the vacuum can, stale and dull coffee is being banished from our tables. Also embarrassing moments caused by serving uncertain coffee to new husbands or others we may wish to impress.*

Community Band Concert

The Holt Communiny Band gave their first concert here this year on Wednesday evening. The attendance was not as large as anticipated but a good sized crowd of people turned out to hear the band play its opening concert of the year.

The band, under the leadership of Rev. Redal, has drilled hard the past few months and Played wonderfully. The proceeds from the concert were about $25 according to the directors of the organization.

The members of the band have to spend a lot of their time practising and each one of them has an investment in instruments and uniforms as well as the monthly dues that they have to pay to keep the institution going. These are facts that the people should not forget when they ask them to come out to play at different doings during the summer.

We are proud to have such a good band in this community and ask each and every one to give them a boost whenever the occasion occurs.

Chinese Early Paper-Makers

Genuine paper was made by the Chinese from very early times. It was probably brought into Europe during the Twelfth century through the Moors. About 1150 a paper mill was established at Fabriano, in Italy. The manufacture spread to France, Germany and England. In 1690 the first paper mill in America was built by William Rittenhouse at Roxborough, near Philadelphia.

AAA Corn-Hog Payments

The influx of AAA corn-hog payments to Minnesota farms was started last week when 25 Scott Co. farmers received their initial payments totaling about $2, 400. These payments represent about two-fifths of the hog payments and about one-half of the corn money which these 25 producers will receive from the administration in the next nine months.

Although insignificant in amount, these payments are the first trickle of an oncoming flood of $25,000,000 that will flow through the pockets of some 80,000 Minnesota farmers, enabling them to catch up on purchases and tax payments long overdue, This money should give support and impetus to business and set revolving a cycle of benefits that will reach back again to the farms and be repeated over and over. This continous cycle of interchange between agriculture and industry is the real foundation of a permanent prosperity, say sponsors of the AAA program.

Only one other state, Iowa, has so far had a taste of corn-hog payments. For the United States as a whole, the total payments for corn-hog reduction will amount to about 350 million dollars to be distributed among nearly 1,200,000 contract signers.

Scott county, because of its proximity to state headquarters of AAA at University Farm, St. Paul, and its standing as a corn and hog county, was chosen as a labratory in which to try out loans for the campaign before they were introduced into other counties of this state. This explains why some of the Scott county farmers received their "early payment" checks before farmers of other counties received theirs.

Big Ben's Big Brother

A remarkable clock erected on the Grand buildings, Trafalgar square, London, is claimed to be the largest in the British empire. Its face is 750 square feet in size, whilst Big Ben is only a little over 400 square feet. The minute hand is really a huge girder 17 feet long. The clock is illuminated day and night by neon. The size of the largest letter is 8 feet 9 inches, and the smallest 2 feet 6 inches.—Answers Magazine.

Public Confidence Returns

Direct information indicates conclusively that the banking situation is showing definite and steady improvement, J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, said in a recent address. He pointed out that the decided drop which has occurred in money in circulation shows the public has largely ceased hoarding.

On March 1, 1934, the Federal Reserve Board reported that the volume of money in circulation amounted to $5,355,000,000, which was a decline of $1,077,000,000 since March 1, 1933. It was a drop of $2,226,000,000, or over 29 per cent from the all-time peak of $7,581,000,000 reached on March 13, 1933. About one-half the decrease, it was pointed out, reflected the return of currency from the public.

Money in circulation declined rapidly after the reopening of the banks in March, 1933, and has continued since to decline from week to week, "notwithstanding the increase in the demand for currency arising from enlargement of pay rolls and increase in the volume of retail trade," the Comptroller said, which, he added, "indicates a continued return of money from hoards as banking facilities were reëstablished."

About Bank Loans

"As for the charge that the banks will not extend credit, the first and obvious reply is that the banks themselves are made up of the very bone and sinew of the industrial, commercial and agricultural interests of the country. Bank directors, and, to a large extent, bank officers, are drawn from the business and farming population. If they do not feel at any given moment that it is wise to make a particular loan, it is more than probable that there are sound reasons for not making it," says an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post.

First Saxophones

Natives of La Mesa Angat, a town in Bulacan province on the Island of Luzon, the Philippines, claim the horn invented by Anton Saxe was copied from the bamboo instruments devised by their forefathers. It looks like a saxophone, it's held like a saxophone, it's blown like a saxophone, and though it may not tweedle precisely the same tweets, the La Mesa Angatans will rest their case on the preponderence of the evidence.

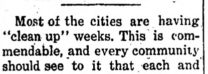
Newfolden Pioneer Called

Word was received here on Monday that Anton Stokke, pioneer farmer hear Newfolden had passed away that day. Mr. Stokke was the father of Mrs. Hjalmer Johnson.

Funeral was held on Tuesday afternoon from the Folden church near his old homestead. Mrs. Stokke passed away a year ago in February.



Most of the cities are having "clean up" weeks. This is commendable, and every community should see to it that each and every living quarter, yard, premises of public property and ~~parks are thoroughly cleaned up.~~

It not only provides work for the unemployed at this time, but it is a good safety measure.

Schools, hospitals, churches, and public buildings require a general cleaning both internally and externally, Stores, manufacturing plants, and railroad properties are made more wholesome, and a greater degree of efficiency is reported as one of the general results. Vacant lots, formerly disease breeders, become gardens or playgrounds.

If it's for health or fire prevention, every living being in the community ought to be for "clean up,, week.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout, and adds to Franz's hate by driving him away from Mary Wolf, Indian girl whom he has been abusing. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up. LaFane "kidnaps" the youth, and makes definite progress in the sobering. Steve wins the friendship of MacDonald, who owns timber land vital to the Flynn interests, by his angling skill.

"Stand there," he said surlily when they had entered the dark room. "I'll make a light."

He took the fish from Steve and laid it on the table, moving the lamp to make room. A noble creature it was, indeed. For an interval the old man stared silently at the trophy. Then, without taking his eyes from it, opened a drawer in the table and fumbled for a small spring scale reposing there.

Together they leaned close, scanning the needle.

"Six pounds!" Steve whispered.

"Six?" in contempt. "Six! Look, mon! Six pounds 'nd two ounces! Ay, better 'n two! Near two 'nd a half ounces!" He straightened with a deep breath. "Ah, what a fish! What a bonny, bonny fish!"

He bent low, hands on his knees, to gaze contemplatively.

"'Nd what," he asked, turning his head but not straightening, "was th' fly, lad?"

The bruskness was gone from his voice, the animosity from his eye. In place of the crusty old fellow he had been, injured, defiant, unrelenting and scornful, he was now as a seeker after news from a superior!

"I used a light cowdung. It matched the insects hatching."

"Ay. A gude fly. Th' smaller ephemeridae. . . . So he was feedin' on them, not waitin' for th' hatch of larger!"

He placed a hand on the younger man's shoulder.

"Mon, ye took him! Beside this one, noo, my grand troot's a youngster, I'll have tae admit. Ut disturbed me a mite, thinkin' ye'd took mine but . . .

"Noo, sit yersel' doon. Hae ye a pipe? So? Well, so ha' I." He went to the mantel and took down a great briar. "Ay. Sit yersel' doon. Noo, tell me, Flynn, how long did ye worrk o'er yon noble afore he took yer fly?"

Steve, with his heart leaping, seated himself and drew out his pipe. He sat silent a brief interval, telling himself that he was about to achieve the thing for which he had set out this evening. He marshaled his wit and his resources, and then began to talk, slowly and carefully, telling the best story he had ever told in his life!

Step by step, Steve relived the battle, recounting his own emotions, his hopes and his fears intimately. At the end he sat back and nodded toward the table and said:

"And there he is, Mr. MacDonald, to prove it!"

"Ay, a grand fight for a lad. I could nae done better mysel', Flynn, if so gude."

He clapped his hands and from a doorway a squaw appeared.

"I'll hae a guest, Annie," he said. "Spread yersel' noo, 'nd do yer best!"

Steve protested that he should be back at headquarters but the Laird would not listen.

"Stay, lad, stay! 'Tis an evenin' to mark well, to celebrate. Ye must stay th' night. Ut's been long since I've had by me 'n angler such as ye are! The others, I've taught thum what they know. But ye, Flynn . . . Well, ye took a better fish than I ever killed!"

And stay the night under the Laird's roof Steve did. Before the meal they drank liquor poured from an ancient jug and sat for long afterward with their pipes. In detail the stories of fish they had taken must be told and it was after midnight before MacDonald led Steve to the room he was to occupy.

While Drake was thus engaged, heart quickening at thought of what this friendship might mean to Polaris, Franz sat on a bench in the store at Good-Bye, silently listening to the gossip of the men gathered there. He had become a fallen favorite and had no longer a place of consequence in their regard.

Wartin came in. "Where's Jim?" he asked.

"Fishin'," Tim Todd replied.

"I'd ought to see him tonight. D' he say when he'd be back?"

"Nope. But he's been stayin' mighty late, recent," the old clerk informed him.

Shortly, Franz went out unnoticed. He took a trail that led back into the timber, circled LaFane's house by a wide margin, and approached the cabin which Steve occupied.

He stood near by for a lengthy interval; then carefully he advanced, tried the door and went within.

It cost him time and pains to find the shotgun, but he did locate it, finally, wrapped in the grain sack and shoved in the leg of the old trousers.

A half hour later he came out on the lake shore again. Gripping the gun by the barrel, he whirled it around his head thrice and let it go. The splash was far out, out where the water was deep enough so that the chance of ever locating the weapon would be negligible.

"There go your d—d finger-prints!" he muttered. "Now try to find a way to stop me!"

* * * * * * *

For breakfast Steve and the Laird had portions of the trout, broiled crisp and brown.

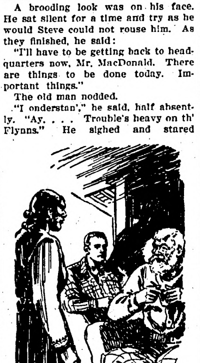
"Food!" the old man muttered. "After all his years, all his triumphs, he ends up as food for his chief enemy! . . . Ut's so wi' th' country, lad: man destroys th' wild to put ut to his use."

A brooding look was on his face. He sat silent for a time and try as he would Steve could not rouse him. As they finished, he said:

"I'll have to be getting back to headquarters now, Mr. MacDonald. There are things to be done today. Important things."

The old man nodded.

"I onderstan'," he said, half absently. "Ay. . . . Trouble's heavy on th' Flynns." He sighed and stared through a window. "I've been thinkin', James lad, since last night that I'm 'n old man at last. I made mysel' a promise when I was yoong: that I'd accept age easy 'nd graceful. 'Nd here, ut develops, I've been fightin' ut off, shuttin' my eyes to 't! . . . Ay, I'm old. 'Nd do ye s'pose, lad, that yer father's still in th' notion o' buyin' my timber?"



"I'll Hae a Guest, Annie," He Said. "Spread Yersel', Noo, 'nd Do Yer Best!"

Steve kept himself from shouting out a glad reply only by effort.

"Polaris would like it, Mr. MacDonald," he said finally. "It . . . Matter of fact it would save the operation. To get held of that timber,"—playing boldly on the favor he had found in the other's eyes—"would do the thing that I came into this country to do. Otherwise, it looks pretty dark ahead."

The Scot nodded.

"Ut's been a burden, in a way, holdin' this property. Ut might relieve 'n old heart to hae money out at intrust instead. . . . I'm a-wonderin' if yer father'd be in a position to buy. He spoke on ut once but I'd hae none o' ut then."

"Polaris can and will buy at any time, Mr. MacDonald," Steve said calmly.

"Well, u'ts a harrd decision to make." —with a twist of his head. "I would nae sell 't all. I'd hold a section or two fer mysel'. But come. . . . We will look. Ut's no matter to decide on th' turn of a moment."

He led the way outside and as they went along slowly Drake was checking against his memory with the cruiser's report on this stand which reposed in the safe at Good-Bye.

Good timber, as good as the Polaris stuff, worth more, surely, than it had been when the estimate was made. Three hundred and twenty thousand, McNally had said, was the price of Old Jim's offer.

They left the trail, making a wide circle, stopping here and there to talk. Once the Laird said:

"Yer not alone in wantin' to buy. Young Franz, a faithful lad, 's been wantin' ut. Had he taken yer grand troot, noo, ut might be him I'd be talkin' wi' today. Mind, I'm not sayin' I'll sell to yer father yet. I'm considerin' only. . . ."

Thrice more during that rambling walk he spoke of Franz, saying that were he here now, instead of Steve, he might be talking over the possibility of selling with him

When they reached the house again the Laird dropped heavily into a chair, more wearied with the sense of age that had come upon him than by the physical exertion. He listened to Steve tell him frankly of the Polaris predicament. He was careful not to mention Franz in connection with the blocked right-of-way but he believed it good strategy to withhold nothing of the Flynn situation, because MacDonald had been wholly open with him.

He knew, from what Kate had written, that this purchase could be financed; he knew, as well, that to possess it was the only way out for Polaris. So much hung in the balance that placid summer afternoon!

Suddenly the Laird sat erect.

"You're authorized to represent Polaris?" he asked.

Steve did not hesitate: "I am representing the company," he said.

"Three hundred 'nd fufty thousand dollars, then, me to hold out th' section my buildin's stand on."

Drake calculated quickly. That was thirty thousand more than old Jim Flynn had offered and a section was held out. But Jim's offer had been made two years ago. Values had stepped upward.

"That's your best offer?"

"Ay. Th' best. Th' only offer, James!"

"And the terms? I've told you how badly Polaris is pinched, sir. A heavy down payment might make it impossible to take you up at once."

The Laird nodded. "Twenty-five thousand doon: fufty thousand in six months: th' balance in one year wi' intrust 't six per cent."

"And how long before the first twenty-five?"

"If ye want ut," he said bruskly, "ye'll take ut wi'out delay. If ye don't want ut, others will. Ye must take ut noo, in a week. Seven days. Ay. That's enough. That's final."

"A short time," Steve protested, but saw that it was no use to ask for more. "You'll give an option now, surely, so I'll have something to go on?"

"That's only fair. An option. 'Nd th' doon payment must be here, in thus room, in cash, 'nd on time. . . . Ay' to th' hour!"

He rose then and walked to a desk, fumbling for paper and pen.

"Age . . ." he mumbled. "Ah, a bonny troot, he was. . . . But age . . . 'Nd ha'in' made up th' mind, ut's time t' act!"

Slowly, laboriously, the pen commenced to scratch.

From a book the old man copied the descriptions, muttering that it would all be legal and regular and that the down payment must be delivered on the hour. "Mind that, lad: th' hoor!"

Again the scratching, MacDonald mumbling: ". . . seven days from . . . four p. m. . . this date . . ."

Down by the river voices sounded and Steve, looking through the window, saw Franz there, sitting in his canoe, talking with one of MacDonald's Indians. . . . Franz! He was getting out, now, asking a question, glancing at the house.

The pen scratched on so slowly. . . . Franz was starting up the trail.

The pen stopped. The Laird leaned back, reading what he had written, moving his lips as he read.

"'Nd noo," the old man said, dipping the pen again. "Noo fer th' signature which binds ut!"

A scuff on gravel outside; a footfall at the threshold. Slowly the pen point traced the letters and as the door opened the blotter was pressed to the fresh ink.

Steve tried not to snatch the precious paper as Franz entered the room. He did not turn to look at him; MacDonald gave no heed. The option passed and a great wave of exultation swept Drake as his fingers closed on it. He read on down the lines of the script, conscious that the Laird was turning to the newcomer, feeling more than seeing that faint bewilderment, perhaps regret, which came over the old man.

"Ah, lad!" he said gently, hitching his chair about. "Come here, lad. Ye know this mon?"

"Sure! I know Young Jim Flynn," Franz replied and laughed.

"Well, lad, ut's th' fortunes of war that 'twas yon James instead of yoursel' who came today to catch me in my state o' mind. I'm sellin' th' timber to th' Flynns."

A slight tightening of the mouth was the only indication Franz gave of what that news meant to him. Then he asked:

"It's gone, you mean? The deal is closed?"

"Well, an option's bindin'. James has th' option, wi' ink scarce dry."

Franz swallowed.

"A sale isn't a sale until the transfer is made," he said, smiling at MacDonald but Steve caught the menace in his tone. "And perhaps something may happen that the Flynns don't take you up."

"Well said, Franz!" The Laird rose and put a hand on his arm. "Well said! 'Twould not becoom ye to sulk 'nd be angered because luck was nae wi' ye. . . . Noo, lads, we'll drunk to 't."

He turned, leaving them alone.

As soon as the door closed behind him Franz spoke:

"So Young Jim Flynn, so-called, has won a fall, eh?"

"Right!"

"But the timber's not yours yet. Not yet, Mr. Whoever-you-are!" He advanced closer and Steve could see a bulge under his armpit which could be nothing but a holstered weapon. "Until a few hours ago you had me partly stopped. Now, squawk all you please about set-guns! You've no evidence!"

"What d'you mean by that?"

Seeds of Black Locust Food for Game Birds

The many-purpose black locust tree, which has been widely planted in this country, is especially valuable as a producer of winter food for game birds. Its seeds are sought in bad weather by the bobwhite, the Hungarian partridge, and the pheasants, especially in the Northwest, reports the United States Department of Agriculture.

The seeds are rated as one of the more valuable foods for bobwhite, Ruffed grouse, California quail, mourning doves in the West, and several of the larger nongame birds of the East also eat them.

Besides furnishing food for game birds, the black locust tree yields timber for the farmer and nectar for the honey bee. It grows rapidly to post, pole, and timber size. Its intricate root system is well adapted for holding soil and checking erosion. As a member of the legume family, the locust tree fixes nitrogen, enriching the soil.

With these several points in its favor black locust is one of the favorites for planting woodlands, groves, eroded areas and odd pieces of waste land about the farm. On account of the presence of harmful insects in certain localities, it is advisable to consult with state forestry agencies before planting on a large scale.

William Green Says Labor Must Force 30-Hour Week—Heavy Goods Industries Against General Wage Increase.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

NOTICE is served on the nation that the 30-hour work week will be forced on industry, by organized labor by the use of widespread strikes, if necessary. This is the dictum of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and it causes consternation in the administration as well as grave alarm in the country generally. Green, in his May day address to workers, says the New Deal has failed to remedy the unemployment situation, since there are still more than ten millions without jobs. The 30-hour week, he says, is the only remedy available since if all industries not yet under codes are brought under them, the resulting re-employment will not give work to these millions.

William Green

Just before Green issued this statement, President Roosevelt had apparently declined to support the Connery bill legislating a 30-hour week for all industry; and General Johnson has recently abandoned as not feasible the plan for forcing a 10 per cent reduction in working hours.

ORGANIZED labor is divided on the issue of compulsory arbitration. The American Federation of Labor has declared that it will not be tolerated and that it will not appoint labor spokesmen to the industrial relations boards now being created until General Johnson gives assurance that these boards will have no power to arbitrate cases unless labor agrees.

Railroad labor, on the other hand, announced a drive for amendment of the railway labor act which would give adjustment boards power to arbitrate controversies arising out of grievances or out of interpretations of rules or agreements.

REPRESENTATIVE BERTRAND SNELL of New York, minority leader in the house, says the period of emergency is over, so he and the rest of the Republican leaders feel free now to demand that the emergency laws and bureaus be dispensed with. An amazing phase of the controversy over the New Deal thus comes to light. The opponents of the administration virtually concede that President Roosevelt and his advisers have won their fight against the depression and declare that normal conditions have been restored or are at hand. But the President and the other New Dealers deny that the battle is over and assert that their recovery measures must be continued in force. At the same time they insist that they are not seeking to change the American system to state socialism, collectivism, communism, fascism, and that what they are accomplishing is "evolution, not revolution."

Thus a most peculiar situation in politics is created, and the man in the street is waiting interestedly to see how it will be handled in the coming campaign.

HARRIMAN is a rather small city in Tennessee but it has presented the NRA with a troubling problem. The town depends largely on the Harriman Hosiery mills, and that concern was ordered to surrender its Blue Eagle because of charges that it had violated section 7A of the national recovery act. Within a few hours the whole town was in revolt. Fifty-six merchants and other business men removed their Blue Eagles and wired to Washington for instructions on what to do with them. General Johnson was informed of the situation and sent two of his trusted lieutenants to Harriman to investigate and endeavor to pacify the angry merchants.

THAT a general wage increase at this time will hinder rather than aid in national economic recovery is the contention of the heavy goods industries, set forth in a report to General Johnson by George H. Houston, chairman of the durable goods industries committee. The report reasserts faith in the company union, approves of emergency price fixing and attacks the Wagner bill as encouraging industrial strife.

A platform of "satisfactory employer-employee relationship" is offered, containing these three planks:

"A wage scale which compensates the worker fairly and generously within the ability of the employer to pay.

"The establishment of safe and satisfactory working conditions.

"Confidence as it is affected by factors other than planks one and two—better homes, better educational facilities and all that goes to make up a healthful and happy community life."

Elsewhere the national labor board, unmentioned specifically, was nevertheless, opposed. The committee added:

"It is our firm conviction that all subsequent procedure in connection with the handling of disputes should be kept within the jurisdiction of the NRA.

"The entire recovery program contemplates the co-operation of industry under codes with the NRA."

BOTH the United States and Great Britain made reply to Japan's claim to sole authority to maintain peace in eastern Asia, and Foreign Minister Koki Hirota answered both with the assurance that Japan intended to observe the terms of the nine-power treaty and to maintain the open door in China. The British note was rather mild and Hirota's reply was held satisfactory by Sir John Simon, secretary for foreign affairs. But Secretary Hull's statement was sharper, being in effect that the United States did not propose to consult with Japan before extending assistance, financial or otherwise, to China so long as such assistance was not in violation of existing treaties.

It was reported in Tokyo that Hirota was satisfied with the British attitude but was greatly concerned over Mr. Hull's note, which was a flat rejection of the Japanese claim concerning the maintenance of peace in China. Mr. Hull issued a lengthy exposition of the American government's position in the matter.

WITH unexpected celerity the railway executives and rail union chiefs reached an accord in the wage dispute, and the danger of a strike was averted for another year. At the instance of President Roosevelt but without government interference they worked out their own settlement after the federal negotiators had failed to get results and Co-ordinator Joseph B. Eastman had withdrawn as mediator.

Under the arrangement decided upon the 10 per cent wage cut which has prevailed in the railroads during the last two years is to be gradually wiped out in the next twelve months. Two and a half per cent of the existing wage cut is to be restored July 1, another 2½ per cent on January 1, and the remaining 5 per cent on April 1, 1935.

In other words, instead of a 10 per cent cut rail workers will have only a 7½ per cent cut prevailing between July 1 and January 1, a 5 per cent cut prevailing between January 1 and April 1, and full pay restoration after April 1.

When informed of the settlement, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"I am very glad that the railroads and their employees have been able to settle their wage dispute by mutual agreement. The country should be, and will be, grateful to them for this disposition of what might have developed into a troublesome controversy. I congratulate both sides on the wisdom and restraint which they have exhibited. They have set a good example."

FEDERAL agents believe they have uncovered a great ring of crooks for the handling of money derived from kidnapings, bank robberies and swindles. They already have arrested a number of men and are hurrying to get others before they are put out of the way by members of the gang, as has been done before. The ring, it is said, has been operating in Chicago, New York, St. Louis, Kansas City and other cities. One of the first men taken into custody was John J. McLaughlin, formerly a state legislator and a political boss in Chicago, suspected of being a leader in the disposal of the "hot money." The specific charge against him is conspiracy in the kidnaping of Edward Bremer, St. Paul banker, for whose release a ransom of $200,000 was paid. The federal agents were diligently searching for William Elmer Mead, a notorious crook, who is thought to have directed the kidnapers.

John J. McLaughlin

McLaughlin confessed that he had handled some of the Bremer ransom money, and his son was arrested with part of it in his pocket.

The Bremer investigation revealed that, a short time before the kidnaping, Martin Wunderlich, a St. Paul and Jefferson City (Mo.) contractor, was swindled out of at least $50,000, according to the operatives, by Mead and his gang, by the old-fashioned horse racing act. It was said Wunderlich obtained the money from Bremer, and this convinced the gang that Bremer would be a promising kidnap victim.

WHILE the pursuit of John Dillinger and his fellow outlaws was being carried on—without success at this writing—three felons made a sensational escape from the Ohio penitentiary at Columbus. Armed with a smuggled automatic pistol, they terrorized 18 officials and guards, collected a shotgun, a gas gun and a rifle, climbed over the walls and fled in an automobile that was waiting outside.

Randall Norvell, a life-term kidnaper, and another convict, got out of the Southern Illinois penitentiary at Chester by crawling through a sewer, crossed the Mississippi in a rowboat, stole a motorboat and recrossed to Illinois, where for the time being they disappeared.

How to Minimize Loss of Vitamins in Cooking

Loss of vitamins during cooking takes place in several ways. They may be destroyed by heat and oxidation, and they may dissolve out in the cooking water which is later discarded. The exact extent of these losses depends upon the length of time of cooking, upon the presence of air, and upon the solubilities of the vitamins concerned, says the bureau of home economics, United States Department of Agriculture.

Vitamins B, C, and G are readily soluble in water. Vitamin C is easily destroyed by heat and oxidation. Vitamin B is destroyed by long-continued heating but undergoes little destruction when heated at the boiling point of water for as long as 1 hour. Both vitamin B and vitamin C are more rapidly destroyed in an alkaline medium than in an acid medium.

Vitamin A is only slightly soluble in water and is not readily affected at the ordinary temperatures of boiling and baking. It is destroyed, however, at higher temperatures such as those that obtain in frying. It is also destroyed when heated in the presence of oxygen. Vitamins D, G, and E are fairly stable to heat and are not destroyed at ordinary cooking temperatures.

The value of any cooked food as a source of vitamins depends largely, of course, on its original value in the natural state. Tomatoes are an excellent source of vitamin C even after they have been cooked. This is explained by the fact that during cooking the acidity of the tomato preserves to a great extent its naturally high vitamin C potency.

In general, the destruction of vitamins is less when foods are heated at high temperatures for short periods, than when they are heated at low temperatures for long periods. There is also less loss when a small quantity of water or no water at all is used. For this reason it is recommended that foods be cooked as short a time and in as little water as is practical. If any cooking water is left it should be used for gravies or soups unless it is so strongly flavored that this is out of the question. Steaming is one of the preferred methods for cooking, since the time required is short and the amount of water used is small.

Big Soviet Salt Deposit

What is described as the world's largest salt deposit has been discovered by an Academy of Science expedition about 100 miles southeast of Stalinibad (formerly Dushambe), capital of the Tadjik Soviet Republic. Eight hundred meters above sea level, on the Hoja-Munin mountain, according to the report, is a salt deposit estimated at 30,000,000 tons.

POPULAR DIVERSIONS

What do most folks do with their leisure hours? Of course individuals have their own pet pastimes and diversions, but a recent survey by the National Recreation association of New York shows that people are going in more for home-centered recreations. Favorite diversions among 5,000 persons in 20 cities were found to be, in order of preference: reading newspapers and magazines, listening to the radio, going to the movies, visiting or entertaining, reading novels, motoring, swimming, letter writing, etc.

Dog Pays Back Rescuer

The life of Jack Sands of County Down, Ireland, has been saved by a dog which he had rescued from a trap. The boy fell into a ravine and broke a leg. The barking of the dog attracted a party of climbers, who followed the animal to the edge of a deep chasm. They rescued the injured lad with ropes.

Pisum Sativum!

Pisum Sativum!

SOUNDS like a magic phrase that fakirs in India mutter to turn ropes into snakes, doesn't it? It is a magic phrase for the housewife, for it produces nourishment, flavor, and variety for many of her choicest menus. Pisum Sativum is only the Latin name for her old friend, the pea! Scientists, who gave the pea its grander name, all praise it for its richness in protein, sugar, and starch, and because it supplies us all three vitamins, A, B and C. Here's a pleasing recipe for the Pisum Sativum in the main course of your dinner:

Pea and Walnut Roast: Take one and a half cups of pea pulp, one cup of soft bread crumbs, a half a cup of chopped walnuts, a quarter of a cup of butter and one egg, beaten. Season with salt, pepper and onion juice. Put into a buttered baking dish or loaf pan and bake in a moderate oven, 350 degrees F. for from thirty to forty minutes, or until set and brown. Serve with hot canned tomato soup, undiluted. Serves eight.

Try This for Lunch

Or if you want a luncheon dish with lots of peas (beg pardon—pisa sativa—that's the plural) in it, try this

Corn and Pea Rarebit on Toast: Make a cheese sauce of two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour, one and one-half cups milk and one cup grated cheese. Drain the contents of an 8-ounce can of whole kernel corn and an 11-ounce can of peas, and sauté a few minutes in two tablespoons butter. Then add to the cheese sauce, season to taste with salt and pepper, and serve on toast. Serves from six to eight.

IN MEMORIAM

We cannot but halt a moment, as we cross the threshold of the beautiful month of May, in silent honor of those who gave their all that we might prosper and live in a world of happiness and peace. "Their" day comes in May. A single day out of a year of length - yet more hearts, and minds, and love, will surrender on Decoration Day than on any other of the year.

The torn hearts of the mothers who lost their "boys" on the battlefields of Europe will rest easier as the Almighty casts his reflection over the world on Decoration Day. The graves of those "boys" will again feel the tears of the loved ones left behind.

No honor is too great for those who laid down their lives in the wars of our nation since its birth. No flowers are beautiful enough to grace the graves of our "Soldiers".

It is our prayer, and the prayer of countless others in all parts of the world, that Decoration Day, this year and will serve to tender the resting places of our great, and ease many heavy hearts.

Mr. and Mrs. Theo. Ness, Olaf Ness, and Henry Fosholm spent Sunday at the Red Lake Narrows where they did some fishidg. They reported wonderful luck and brought home a lot of fish to prove it.

Several members of the Nazareth Lutheran Ladies Aid here spent Wednesday at Viking where they attended the Women's Missionary Federation meeting. They reported that a very large crowd was in attendance.

Carl Ludvig Sandberg

A pall of sadness was cast over the people of this village and community on Saturday when they learned of the death of C. L. Sandberg, one of the prominent businessmen and citizens here. Mr. Sandberg passed away peacefully at his home here early Saturday forenoon after a lingering illness of several months' duration. The direct cause of his death was cancer of the stomach.

Carl Ludvig Sandberg was born in Ericsborg, Sweden, on October 5, 1873, and immigrated to this country in the year 1892, joining a brother at Minneapolis. He made his home there for four years, after which he moved to Thief River Falls in 1896.

He was united in marriage with Elvera Elizabeth Larson on March 29, 1900. To this union eleven children were born. He made his home in Thief River Falls until in 1915 when he moved with his family to Holt where he has made his home since that time.

When he first came to Thief River Falls, Mr. Sandberg operated a farm for three years for Charles Knox. After that he became associated with the Thief River Falls Lumber Company and acted as shipping clerk for them for a few years.

When they shut down their lumber mill in that city after having sold out to the Winton-Nichols Lumber Company, Mr. Sandberg came to operate their line yard for them here.

He served as their retail yardman here until in 1929 when they decided to sell out their business. Mr. Sandberg at that time bought their yard and stock here and has been active in the lumber business here ever since.

Mr. Sandberg built a fine home here and helped in many ways to improve our little village and community in the past nineteen years that he was here.

Those who are left to mourn the loss of a dear husband and father are: his wife, Mrs. Elvira Elizabeth Sandberg, and eight children, Mrs. Geo. Smith and Clarence Sandberg of Fairbanks, Alaska; Mrs. Eric Soderberg of Pontiac, Mich.; Marvin, Walter, David, Clara, and Robert, all of Holt. He also leaves one brother in California and a sister in Sweden.

Three children have preceded him in death.

He served as a member of the village council and of the school board, and for the past two years he was treasurer of the Nazareth Lutheran church. Mr. Sandberg was a good neighbor in both his business and social life.

Many of his old friends and neighbors from Thief River Falls and St. Hilaire attended the funeral services, at which about three hundred people were in attendance.

Rev. Redal spoke the funeral sermon and filled the hearts of the sorrowing relatives and his family with the kind thoughts and hope that Mr. Sandberg has passed safely across to the other side where there is no more struggle and strife.

The pallbearers were: Hjalmer Peterson, H. O. Hanson, C. L. Heinze, John Simonson, O. H. Nohre and Fred Steinhauer.

His business associates and friends gave a memoriam fund of $35.00. The Carlson Merc. Co. had charge of all arrangements and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Two Killing Frosts Here

The heavy killing frosts of the past few nights has raised cane with a lot of the early seeded flax in this community, according to reports we have received from the farmers. The Rodahl brothers stated that they have lost eighty acres that was up and coming along fine. They will reseed the field. Others have lost all the way from a few acres to as much as fifty acres.

Most of the gardens that were up have wilted and do not look like they are going to amount to much unless they are replanted.

Judge of the District Court
Appointed by Governor Olson on February 28, 1934.

When Judge Julius J. Olson was named as Associate Justice of the State Supreme Court, I was appointed by Governor Floyd B. Olson as Judge Olson's successor, and since that time have served in that position. I have filed as a candidate for District Judge at the June Primary Election.

Owing to official work I have little time to devote to the campaign and must therefore depend on such voluntary interest as my friends and supporters will give in my behalf.

During the time I have been permitted to serve as a District Judge it has been my endeavor to do so fairly and impartially, and if privileged to continue for a full term, I trust my attitude on the bench shall always be just and fair.

Respectfully,

Another little lamb has gone
To dwell with him who gave.
Another little darling babe
Is sheltered in the grave.

God needed one more angel child
Amidst his shining band,
And so He bent with tender smile
And clasped our darling's hand.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up. Steve wins the friendship of MacDonald, who owns timber land vital to the Flynn interests and the Scotsman gives him an option for Polaris to buy his timber.

—12—

"Never mind. Just try to get any evidence on me for anything, now, and see how far you'll get! Just because you've gotten hold of an option don't think you'll pulled Polaris up by its boot-straps! Not yet, you—"

He broke short as the Laird opened the door, bearing in both hands the precious jug.

Steve thought for a moment that Franz was only awaiting a chance to go on and unmask him before the Scot and he was prepared to meet any such move with an admission of the truth. The option was made out to the company, to no individual, and he would claim rightful possession of it no matter what came.

But Franz said no more and Drake put this down to the other's knowledge of MacDonald, his whims and moods. Likely Franz did not dare, in this mellow moment, wield the club he held.

They drank together and Steve folded the document, slipping it into his breast pocket.

"The time is none too long now, Mr. MacDonald," he said, bound to leave before any complications arose. "I'll have to be on my way, now. This means a lot of quick work in Chicago."

"Ay. Seven days, James. . . .'Nd 'twus a grand troot, a grand, bonny troot."

The old man did not rise, as Steve picked up his hat.

"I'll see you, I trust, on the seventh day, sir. My thanks for your hospitality."

With no more farewell, except a curt nod to Franz, he left them and strode down to the river.

The option in his pocket was a warm, living weight against his breast, a charge to keep, a trust to guard. Where his own safety was concerned he would have laughed at any menace Franz might present, but more than his personal safety was at stake, now. He bore the hopes of Old Jim Flynn in his pocket and until he had it safely recorded in public files he could not rest.

His canoe was waiting, having been brought down-stream from where he had fished by one of the Laird's Indians, and as he launched for the first stage of the journey he had a flash of a pursuer, ruthless and determined. Drake was unarmed; he well knew that the shoulder holster beneath the other's shirt was not empty. . . .

He did not hasten so long as he was in sight of the MacDonald establishment, but when he rounded the first bend he bent forward and paddled until his canoe leaped and weaved at the drive of the blade.

He knew the country and the trails well enough, but Franz knew them more intimately than he. The landing above Twenty Mile rapid was the obvious place for one to leave the river and take to his legs for transport. To run the white water, of course, would cut miles from the journey but the risk of tragic disaster was great.

He speculated as he speeded along, trying to put himself in Franz's position, trying to reason as Franz would reason. When he reached his decision he commenced to smile with tongue in cheek. He relaxed his paddling and chuckled and sat back, drifting with the current.

He could hear the grumble of the treacherous water below, and ran his canoe into a shallows where it was screened by overhanging alders and waited, looking backward.

Of course, Franz might not do what Steve expected of him, but he was proceeding on the belief that to block the recording of that all-important document he would be forced to follow. . . .

"Right!" Drake muttered aloud as a canoe shot into sight far behind, coming fast.

He shoved off and bent to the paddle and in a moment from the tail of his eye he saw the other sweep into sight of him, and then he was rounding a bend with the voice of shaggy old Twenty Mile growing louder in his ears.

He looked over his shoulder just once. Franz had not rounded the bend yet. A leaning cedar was fifty feet beyond him. He rose to one knee, dropped his paddle and balanced there, arms raised.

The cedar rushed at him. The first twigs brushed his hands. His right closed on a stout, green branch. He snatched at another with his left, missed, and grappled at a dry stub. He gave these holds his weight, gambling they would bear it, lifted his feet and let the canoe shoot on. The stub cracked warningly and, wriggling, kicking, he let it go and grasped living wood and with a heave swung himself sideways and up, until he lay along the bole, panting furiously as he drew branches about himself for concealment.

He could see his canoe, tossing like a chip, enter the first white water and disappear around the sharp bend.

So much accomplished! Now, he turned his face up-stream. Franz was approaching, making in toward the trail landing. He leaped out as the bow touched rock and stopped to grasp the thwarts and lift the canoe out and checked all movement, then moved slowly into the trail, scanning the rocks and earth.

Steve chuckled. No sign was there for him to see! Even at the distance he could detect Franz's bewilderment. He went a short distance up the trail and returned, scratching his head and peering down into the head of the rapid.

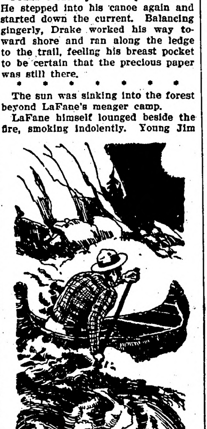
A moment before, Franz had had Drake in sight. The only place he could have left the river was at that trail; leaving it, he could not have failed to leave signs. Easy!

Franz evidently made up his mind. He stepped into his canoe again and started down the current. Balancing gingerly, Drake worked his way toward shore and ran along the ledge to the trail, feeling his breast pocket to be certain that the precious paper was still there.

* * * * * * * *

The sun was sinking into the forest beyond LaFane's meager camp.

LaFane himself lounged beside the fire, smoking indolently. Young Jim Flynn sat with his back against a tree, glowering.



Down Into the Rushing Maw of the River Went Franz.

"Going to starve me next?" he blurted.

The other shook his head. "No. Whatever is done to you, you do. Within limits, that is."

"Limits!"—bitterly. "When I didn't want to come in here, you beat me up; when I tried to leave you did it again. Now it's nothing but coffee for both of us. Enjoying it, are you?"
